Louisiana governor denies accepting bribes from casinos

By NATALIE GOTT
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

BATON ROUGE, La. — Testifying without his usual what-me-worry swagger, former Gov. Edwin Edwards denied Tuesday that he took payoffs for Louisiana casino licenses and said one of his accusers turned on him because the government put the pressure on.

The 72-year-old Edwards displayed little of his wisecracking Cajun wit but was relaxed and confident as he took the stand in his federal racketeering trial, heading into its fourth month.

Edwards began with a terse denial that he exerted any illegal influence over the state's gambling boards.

"Did you do anything to corrupt the gaming board?" defense attorney Daniel Small asked.

"Absolutely not," Edwards answered.

"Did you do anything to corrupt the gaming commission?"

"Absolutely not."

He then launched into his life story — rural childhood, growing up in a house without electricity or indoor plumbing, college interrupted by the Navy during World War II, then graduation from law school.

He began a point-by-point rebuttal of charges that he and his six co-defendants carried out a series of extortion schemes involving the licensing of riverboat casinos.

Edwards focused on former Treasure Chest Casino owner Robert Guidry. Guidry said he paid $1.5 million to Edwards, once dropping money off at his home, other times delivering the payoffs by way of Edwards' son Stephen or their friend Andrew Martin.

"I never got a cent from Mr. Guidry. My son never got a cent from Mr. Guidry. As far as I know, Mr. Martin never got a cent from Mr. Guidry," Edwards said.

Guidry, Edwards said, was a close friend who turned on him while under pressure from federal prosecutors.

Edwards said that seven days before Guidry pleaded guilty in 1998, Guidry called and arranged a meeting at a discount shopping mall.

"With tears in his eyes, he said he couldn't take the pressure any more and was going to make a deal," Edwards said.

"I told him to tell them anything as long as it was the truth," Edwards continued. "He said, 'I'll do what I can, but they want me to say something bad.' I told him, 'Life is too short and eternity too long to do something like that.'"

Edwards answered questions with a serious attitude as Assistant U.S. Attorney Jim Letten launched a hostile cross examination.

"You just lied, didn't you, sir? Lied to the jury, didn't you, sir?" Letten said.

"They'll have to determine that," Edwards replied.

Letten asked again.

"I did not lie," Edwards said.

In his testimony, Edwards never directly addressed one of the most sensational tales of the trial: former San Francisco 49ers owner Eddie DeBartolo's claim that Edwards wore a money belt under his shirt to smuggle a $400,000 cash payoff through the San Francisco Airport on March 12, 1997.

Edwards acknowledged taking the money out of DeBartolo's car in a briefcase during the meeting, but he said, as he has said all along, that the money was a perfectly legal payment for consulting work he did to help DeBartolo get a casino license.

The license was awarded on March 13, 1997.

It was the second time Edwards found himself on the witness stand in his own defense.

A 1985 federal trial stemming from health care investment deals ended in a hung jury. Edwards was acquitted in a retrial in 1986.

By his own count, Edwards has been the subject of almost two dozen state or federal investigations going back to his days as a congressman in the '60s, and four terms as governor in the 1970s, '80s and '90s.

On Tuesday, he testified that people have long invoked his name without his permission to gain political advantage.

It is "a problem that has haunted me since I was first elected governor," Edwards said.

The government has claimed that Edwards often used cronies to shake down casino-license applicants, thereby insulating himself from any appearance of wrongdoing.

Task force evaluates harassment policies

Affirmative Action

These are the recommendations offered by Faculty Senate's task force members.

- Formal procedures for how the university deals with complaints of discrimination be established and placed in the Faculty Handbook.
- There should be some procedures to follow-up on complaints.
- There should be some way to address issues that were clearly unfair but not unlawful.
- The university administration needs to take a strong stand with respect to what is intolerable treatment and needs to back it up with strong consequences.
- The university needs to educate the university community as to the true nature and scope of the Office of Affirmative Action's responsibilities and abilities.
- Relocate the Office of Affirmative Action outside of Anderson Hall to distance the office from the university administration.
- Mediation should be available as an option early in the process of resolving conflicts and complaints.
- In practice, current university policies provide employees with little protection against low-level harassment and retaliation. New policies must be developed to address this problem.
- It should be made clear that there is no statute of limitations for filing complaints with the Office of Affirmative Action.

By CRISTINA JANNEY
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A Faculty Senate task force has recommended that people with harassment and discrimination complaints should have more outlets to resolve problems.

The task force looked at the discrimination and harassment complaint functions of the K-State Office of Affirmative Action and presented a report to Faculty Senate on Tuesday.

"Sometimes people have been treated badly, and it is not because of their status, such as a woman or member of a racial or ethnic group," said Jerome Frieman, chairman of the task force. "Those cases the affirmative action office doesn't have a mandate to do anything about."

The affirmative action office serves students and all university staff. It only has the responsibility to investigate cases that deal with unlawful harassment or discrimination.

The report said more should be done to deal with problems before they escalate.

"We don't have a good mechanism to handle disputes and complaints really early in the process," said Frieman, who was the interim affirmative action officer for the university.

Buddy Gray, Faculty Senate president, said there should be a separate agency on campus to handle these complaints.

"Faculty members may have experienced harassment that is subtle. It is hard to put a finger on it," he said. "It is hard to prove that the law has been broken or university rules have been broken."

The provost's office is looking at the report and considering the recommendations.

A mediation process is a possibility that the administration is seriously considering.

"We need to give a lot of thought to the structure of mediation," Provost James Coffman said. "Some events are serious events. They do not meet the legal standard, but they have been the concern of an individual."

K-State has no formal mediation process for faculty now, Frieman said.

The university has looked at the mediation processes of other universities. Each institution has a different system, he said. A process for K-State mediation would have to be considered carefully, he said.

The task force also saw a weakness in the lack of follow-up on complaints.

Sanctions can be recommended by the affirmative action office and are supposed to be imposed by administration. However, there is no formal follow-up to confirm that the sanctions were imposed, Frieman said.

Frieman said he thought the sanctions were being imposed, but some on the committee expressed

McBride, Wills to sing tonight

By JENN DAVOREN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Two months remain before the arrival of the Country Stampede, but Bramlage Coliseum would like to offer a quick fix for country music fans.

Martina McBride and special guest Mark Wills will perform at 7:30 tonight at the sports arena, providing Manhattan with the first Bramlage music event of the semester.

McBride, a Kansas native, is expected to play selections from albums such as her latest, "Evolution," which features tracks such as "A Broken Wing," "Happy Girl" and "Valentine."

Opening act Mark Wills, Academy of Country Music's top new male vocalist of 1999, is known best for selections such as "I Do (Cherish You)" and "Wish You Were Here."

Tickets for the concert are $21 for general seating and $29 for a limited number of Golden Circle seats, and with only half of the almost 7,000 total seats sold, plenty of opportunities exist for McBride fans to attend the concert, said Jim Muller, associate director of Bramlage.

"Since there are no obstructions in Bramlage, the cheaper seats are just as good as the more expensive ones," he said.

Muller said the coliseum's staff would be working today to ready the sports arena for concert goers.

"Basically, since we haven't had a lot of concerts here lately, we're checking our notes and changing the arena over to our concert configuration," he said.

Ticket holders will get a bit of a multimedia

Privilege Fee Committee works to inform campus

By ANGELA KISTNER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students pay $251 in privilege fees each semester. Next fall that number will increase by $6, pending approval by the Kansas Board of Regents.

This $6 recommendation is not specifically earmarked for one organization, Student Body President Jake Worcester said.

However, because the Privilege Fee Committee is recommending more funds to be allocated to pay for such things as student health and the Office of Student Activities and Services, it needed to collect more revenue to pay for this increase.

This pending increase brings to light a Student Senate initiative last year to educate the student body about privilege fees.

Committee chair Ryan Walker said he would like students to know more about what a privilege fee is and what it goes toward.

"One, I would show them where their money goes and how much of their $251 is used for what," he said. "Two, I would explain the whole point of privilege fees. For us to have these services, we have to pool money together for these services that we're proud of and for students to use while they are here."

The privilege fee began after World War II, when soldiers came back from war and were quickly enrolling in college and many services could not be provided. Now, every student pays a privilege fee each semester that is allocated to 21 different services on campus by the Privilege Fee Committee.

Any change in privilege fees has to be approved by the Board of Regents. For the 1999-2000 academic year, students paid $64 in privilege fees for the first credit hour and $17 for each additional hour, up to 12 credit hours.

Walker said that in his personal experience, students see the $251 that shows up on their tuition bill as just a number — one that doesn't mean anything to them.

He said many students don't know that, besides the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex and Lafene Health Center, their privilege fees cover other things, such as athletics, the band and the Office of Student Activities and Services.

"They definitely need to be educated about what their money is being used for," he said. "Privilege fees affect every student on campus, no matter if you use the service or not, you still pay for it."

Walker said the complaint he hears the most is students saying they don't use the services, so why should they have to pay for them?

Walker's answer is, "We cover each other's costs. One student might go to Lafene three times a month but never use the Rec Complex, and vice versa for another student.

"As a student at K-State, that's the partnership you join when you come to the university,"

Walker said.

Privilege Fee Committee vice chair Ted Conrad also said it's important that students are educated about privilege fees.

"It's important because there's always a lot of issues that come out during the school year that deal with that," he said.

When students hear about a change in privilege fees or read about it in the paper, they need to

Privilege Fee Breakdown

For students enrolled in 12 credit hours or more, this is how the $251 privilege fee tacked on to their tuition breaks down. A $6 increase for next year's fees is pending approval, which would adjust the current allocations.

KSU outfielder kicked off team

By ERIN SCHNEWEIS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Collin Yoachim, outfielder for K-State's baseball team, was dismissed from the team Wednesday for violating team rules.

At 1:58 a.m. Wednesday, Yoachim, sophomore in pre-health professional, was pulled over by the campus police on North Manhattan Avenue and Claflin Road, K-State Police Lt. Dave Johnson said.

Johnson said Yoachim was pulled over for driving 41 mph in a 30 mph zone. Yoachim also was driving from left to the center of the lane. He then was taken to the Riley County Police Department for DUI testing, where he was arrested.

RCPD Officer Silvia Zappas said Yoachim no longer is in jail.

"He was released on bond at 5 a.m.," Zappas said. "He was released to Jim Clark, who is a bonding agent."

Tom Gilbert, assistant sports information director, said Yoachim was released from the team due to violation of the team rules. The Department of Intercollegiate Athletics will not discuss the disciplinary issues regarding the case.

On March 29, K-State third baseman, Joshua Cavender was arrested for a DUI by the RCPD. Gilbert said Cavender was not dismissed from the team.

"When Josh had his incident, the coaching staff decided to suspend him for three games," Gilbert said.

"It was a warning. They basically said if this happens again, then the next person will be dismissed. Collin, unfortunately, was the next player to be dismissed."

■ At 2:20 a.m., Alvin L. Ray, 121 S. Remelle St., was arrested for DUI. Bond was set at $1,000.

■ At 3:09 a.m., Christopher Jackson, 1919 Hunting Ave., was issued a notice to appear for fictitious driver's license, minor in possession of alcoholic liquor and open container of alcoholic liquor in public.

■ At 3:58 a.m., Collin D. Yochim, 2215 College Ave., was arrested for DUI, speeding and improper driving in lane. Bond was set at $500.

Student Publications picks summer, fall management

Student Publications Inc. finished filling its top managerial positions for summer and fall Wednesday.

Reed Dunn, senior in print journalism, was selected as the fall Collegian editor. Dunn is the arts and entertainment editor this semester. He has also worked at the Collegian as a staff writer and photographer.

"I just want to tweak what is a good paper and do what I can to serve the readers and the K-State campus," Dunn said.

Dunn said he hoped to recruit staff members from other departments to increase the Collegian staff's diversity.

Friday is the deadline for applications for senior staff writers and desk editors. The application deadline for all other positions is Wednesday.

Wendy Schantz, sophomore in journalism, was selected as the 2001 Royal Purple editor. She was the 2000 Royal Purple assistant editor and a copy editor for the 1999 Royal Purple.

"My main goal is to increase sales and to get our name out so more people realize we have a yearbook on campus," Schantz said.

The deadline for Royal Purple applications is 5 p.m. Friday.

Alissa Duncan, junior in theater and secondary education, was hired as the summer advertising manager.

She said she wanted to increase sales for the Preview and Orientation editions and for the campus phonebook. Duncan said she wants her staff to have fun and learn.

Angela Kistner, graduate student in sociology, was selected as summer Collegian editor March 8.

Kistner earned a bachelor's degree in print journalism in December. She has been the Collegian's news editor and city/government editor and is serving as a senior staff writer this semester.

"I want to give people a broad experience in the different aspects of the newspaper," Kistner said.

The summer Collegian prints in tabloid form on Tuesday, Wednesdays and Thursdays.

Kistner said she wanted to focus on content and hoped the staff would be able to produce some in-depth features that would grab the interest of the readers.

The summer staff deadline has been extended to the end of this semester.

Jim Calvert, junior in marketing, was selected on March 8 as the fall advertising manager.

Calvert is the current advertising manager and served on the advertising staff for a year prior to taking over as advertising manager.

Sales are up this spring compared to last spring, and Calvert said he has tried to improve staff training.

He said he hoped to change the structure of the staff, but he is still in the process of planning. He said he also would like to have pre- and post-season football magazines.

Advertising staff applications will be accepted through Wednesday.

All Student Publications applications can be picked up and returned to Kedzie 103.

Smoking during pregnancy leads to behavior problems

CHICAGO — Women who smoke while pregnant are far more likely to have children who develop behavior problems as toddlers, a study found.

The findings add to a growing body of research indicating that smoking by mothers-to-be can harm children.

Nearly all 2-year-olds exhibit some rebelliousness, risk-taking and impulsiveness.

But such behavior was four times more likely in toddlers whose mothers smoked during pregnancy, according to the study published today in the Archives of Pediatrics & Adolescent Medicine.

The findings suggest a chemical root for the problem behavior, since the researchers took into account sociological factors that might have affected the children, such as a mother's stress, personality and income level.

Dr. Alan Leshner of the National Institute of Drug Abuse, which funded the study of the 99 toddlers and their mothers, said smoking might alter children's behavior by exposing the fetus to nicotine, which could reduce the amount of oxygen that gets to the brain.

The researchers, led by Judith Brook of Mount Sinai School of Medicine in New York, also suggest, as others have, that problem behavior linked to maternal smoking is likely to continue into adolescence.

Celebrity memorabilia. SAN DIEGO — An investigation into fake sports and celebrity memorabilia has resulted in charges against 25 people and the seizure of thousands of items with forged autographs — including a baseball supposedly signed by Mother Teresa.

"This is by far the largest memorabilia fraud investigation in the FBI's history," special agent William Gore said Wednesday as authorities put the confiscated goods on display.

In addition to those already charged, about 40 more likely will be charged in coming months, U.S. Attorney Gregory Vega said.

Merchandise included items with fake autographs from Albert Einstein, Abraham Lincoln, Marilyn Monroe, Michael Jordan, Martin Luther King Jr., Babe Ruth, Lou Gehrig, Mark McGwire and Tony Gwynn.

Some of the items were comically fake, such as the baseball supposedly autographed by Mother Teresa, Assistant U.S. Attorney Phillip Halpern said Tuesday.

Service project to benefit local shelters

By KELLY EVENSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Cleaning out closets and getting rid of food might seem tedious, but the project could assist those in need.

The Foodservice, Hospitality Management and Dietetics Administration Graduate Club is conducting a food and clothing drive through April 21. Toni Bryant, graduate club social chairwoman, said the service project, which benefits the Ogden Friendship House and the Women's Crisis Center, is important because it is giving support to those local entities that are in need of assistance.

"We always do a large service project for the club each year," Bryant said.

"This is a huge support for the community that has many low-economic families. We saw a need so we decided to help out."

Bryant said the center, which serves as a thrift shop and food bank for the Ogden community, is completely self-supporting.

She said funding and support used to come from the Flint Hills Breadbasket, but now the house has to find other ways to re-stock its shelves.

Judy Atwood, director of ministries at the Ogden Friendship House, said they are grateful of the work being done by the graduate student organization and donors because of the number of people the house serves.

"People are hungry 365 days a year," Atwood said.

"The donations from the service project helps the people we serve by allowing us to give food and necessities to the Ogden residents who are in need."

Bryant said the assistance the project will be giving to the crisis center also is important because the center always is in need of extra support.

She said the items being requested do not have to be expensive, but things the people at both centers can still use.

"We are not asking for brand-name items," Bryant said. "Only things that can help support kids and families."

Bryant said the project, which began Monday, has been extremely successful in only its first few days. She said the collection bins had to be emptied by noon on the first day and are filling up quickly again. Collection bins have been placed in the front lobby of Justin Hall under the kiosk and by the vending machines near the elevator.

"Just through the Human Ecology department, there has been an overwhelming response," Bryant said. "I think the fact that all of us are from food- and family-related areas of study allows us to see that there is a need to be taken care of. We are a family-orientated college, and we want to help with the problem."

Carol Shanklin, adviser to the graduate student club and professor of food service and hospitality management, said in its first year, the service project only collected items for the friendship house. She said, however, this year, the students wanted to incorporate more people to assist.

"The group wanted to be able to help the needs of two different groups this year," Shanklin said.

"The project helps them to look beyond their own needs and concentrate on helping their community. It helps them to say that they did something small for someone else."

Shanklin also said she thinks there has been a positive response to the service project because of the family-oriented background of the students, faculty and staff of the College of Human Ecology.

"Most of the faculty are involved in service outreach in some way," Shanklin said.

"It is inherent in the nature of the faculty and staff here to help out."

Apartment fair provides living-option advice

By JENNIFER RYAN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students looking for apartments found advice and living options at Wednesday's K-State Apartment Fair.

"Look at the price," said Kristin Howard, Consumer and Tenant Affairs intern and senior in family studies and human services.

"Find out where the cheapest rent is, but still has the things you want."

Renters also should require a written lease from the landlord and walk through the actual apartment rather than a model, Howard said.

"Don't rely on just the model," she said. "The model may look great, but your apartment could look different."

Look for landlords who are willing to talk, listen and answer questions. This shows their ability to listen to problems you may have later in the year, said Lana Humphress, Consumer and Tenant Affairs intern and senior in family life and human services.

"Take your lease to someone and really look at it. Go into the agreement with your eyes wide open," Humphress said.

"Always do the walk-through with your landlord. If you can, take photos or videotape it. Try to get a camera with the date and time."

large concern when renting an apartment or house, Humphress said.

"Be careful about picking roommates," she said. "Discuss what you expect before you move in together. About 60 percent of the people who see me, that's their problem."

The apartment fair showcased several living options for students: Jardine Apartment Complex, Chase Manhattan Apartments, University Commons, McCullough Development Inc., Hill Investment and Rental Co., and Alliance Property Management Inc.

"Start looking early," said Nicole Reimer, Chase Manhattan Apartment representative and junior in pre-health and information management.

"Look around until you find something that suits you. If you live with roommates, make sure you know who you're living with and if they're responsible people."

Also, before calling property managers and landlords, know what to ask of them.

"Know what you're looking for," said Jennifer Bangs, property manager for McCullough.

"It saves time and helps you remember the apartments. If you just start looking around, the apartments start to seem the same and none stand out."

The fair also supplied students with "The Lead Apartment Guide," which outlines Manhattan housing options and can be found free at the Union, grocery stores and convenience stores.

"Take care of finding an apartment before you leave for summer," said Wade Spencer, president of Lead Printing and Publishing Inc.

"The choices are much more limited."

Gas line burst near Union evacuates Anderson Hall

By ANGELA KISTNER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Construction workers broke a gas line Wednesday morning while working on construction of the Union Plaza east of the free-speech zone.

Manhattan battalion chief Jerry Snyder said construction workers were moving some pavement in the area and they hit a 2-inch plastic gas line.

"The gas line wasn't as deep as they thought it was," he said.

K-State Police officer John Selvidge said because of the northwest wind, the gas odor was blown toward Anderson Hall, causing it to be evacuated.

Snyder said some people in Anderson complained of the gas smell and felt nauseated.

"We went over there and found a slight odor," he said. "Some people are more sensitive to that odor than others."

Snyder said that when the people from Anderson went outside and got some fresh air, they felt much better. He also said the Emergency Medical Service checked out everyone who had complaints of nausea to make sure they were OK.

"There was never really an explosive situation over there," he said.

Selvidge said a little bit of the gas smell affected the main floor of the K-State Student Union, but that was dissipated quickly by opening the doors for ventilation.

"Dykstra emergency personnel, the fire department and the ambulance service responded real quickly and got the main shut off, and that eliminated the source quickly," he said. "It was handled very professionally."

SGA should focus on education about fees

Most K-State students spend more than $500 a year on privilege fees and have only a vague idea of where that money goes.

Full-time students now pay $251 per semester — a sum that will increase by $6 next semester — for campus privilege fees. However, few know exactly what they are spending their money on.

Students, however, are only partially to blame for this lack of knowledge.

Student Governing Association — and specifically Student Senate's Privilege Fee Committee — have not taken all measures possible to inform students how their money is being appropriated.

However, Privilege Fee Committee Chair Ryan Walker has some ideas that would be beneficial to students.

The most important of these ideas is to provide students an itemized breakdown on their tuition bills of how privilege fees are allocated.

This is an excellent idea and a wonderful attempt to improve on the lack of communication about privilege fees that Senate acknowledged was a weakness during the past year.

Because the fees are large, informing students is important.

Therefore, Senate should continue looking for ways to make strides in this area. While it is off to a great start, there are other ways it could improve.

Ideas include posting this information on KATS, adding public-relations representatives to communicate with media and students and better explaining privilege fees during the visits that Senate members already are required to make to campus organizations.

This, however, is not meant to be a criticism of SGA or the Privilege Fee Committee. Privilege fees are a difficult subject, and Senate has made efforts to explain them. For this to work, it needs the help of students.

Students should pay attention to news about privilege fees, offer input to their senators and consider attending a Senate or committee meeting when one comes along.

With some effort, Senate can teach students where their money is going. Students will listen.

No one likes to spend $500 and have its whereabouts be a mystery.

Ordinary Women march earns alumnae's praise

Editor,

First, you have my thanks for the front-page article Monday about the Take Back the Night March. There are many times important events happen on campus and the articles about them are pushed back in the paper. The support by the Collegian of the critical nature of this march encourages me.

I participated in last year's Take Back the Night March. I was disappointed to see I would be out of town for this year's event. My undying support goes to the women who participated this year as well as last. To raise your voices in unison shows a confidence and pride vital in the movement against violence. I am excited to see that the event has grown in number of participants, publicity and the area it covers. Last year we stayed on campus. It is good to see the march spread to other areas, such as Aggieville, where violence also can occur, bringing awareness to those in the community.

So, Ordinary Women — both the organization and all others who fit that phrase — congratulations on making a statement here on campus. May your efforts continue to reach the women and men of K-State and Manhattan.

For it is through awareness, commitment and passion that changes can be made.

creative dates can give life to any relationship

My project group was trying to find a night to work together. Like every other group of college students, we were not coming up with any possible time. Sunday, Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday — we were all booked.

Someone suggested Thursday. I couldn't do it. They asked why. "It's my date night," I said.

They were more than surprised.

Jimmy and I decided when we were married we would make it a priority to spend quality time together each week. We saw too many couples who had lost each other over time, and we didn't want that for ourselves.

Relationships are interesting that way. There is so much to say in the beginning. It seems like you can't spend enough time together. Then slowly, as you feel comfortable the relationship starts to seem dull.

The relationship isn't the problem, really, it's the comfort level. Thus, the reason Jimmy and I have a date night. We are both continually changing. We need a time to connect and focus on each other amid the changes.

Jimmy and I are probably in the minority in that, as the leader of our relationship, he takes the role of coming up with dates. We believe that our sexes, equal but different, makes this method better for us. In our dating relationship, he was the pursuer; it has carried over to our marriage.

At times, this has been hard for him. Coming up with creative dates has been difficult. So, for those of you in a committed relationship, married or just starting out, here are some ideas to make your life together more fulfilling.

- Take a walk out at the Konza Prairie. It's a beautiful place to be with beautiful people. Plus, you can see how in shape you are.
- Tuttle Creek State Park has wonderful nature trails. You will always be able to find a new one each time you go. Stop by the Corps of Engineers building and ask where to find them.

• Park your car at the bottom of Manhattan hill. Find the climbing trail. Once you're on top, enjoy the view. Then, I suggest you climb down and get ice cream at Dairy Queen.

• Go to the Marianna Kistler Beach Art Museum. If you don't know anything about art, that's OK. Find your favorite, then get some supplies. Try to recreate your favorite painting. You'll both end up laughing at your creative abilities.

• Go for coffee at one of our many coffee shops. You can catch up on the week, as well as planning something fun for the weekend.

• Try some of the hole-in-the-wall spots around Manhattan. In Riley, the Calico Inn has great food. In Junction City, the Imperial Palace has great Chinese food. The car drive gives you time to talk.

• Go to Memorial Stadium and watch the sunset. Hundreds of K-Staters before you enjoyed the view — keep the tradition alive. Do it soon or you might have the K-State Alumni Association's company.

- Take a walk around the park, any of them.
- Go to Wildcat Creek Sports Center and hit some balls or putt-putt.

• Go bowling. (Personally, I feel this one is overused, but if it is your joy, go ahead.)

• Go to the lake and build a fire. Bring along marshmallows, chocolate and graham crackers. Forget the hangers and look for your own sticks.

• If you can't cook, this one is for you. Go pick up some fast food, then find a quiet picnic spot. Make sure to bring a blanket to sit on.

The key to a good date, no matter what you do, is to be intentional and real with your date.

What could be better in life than to spend it with the people you love? Go on and enjoy yourself.

Texas governor does little to clean up his own state

If you'd like to die a slow, painful, premature death — and I mean this literally — vote for Texas Gov. George W. Bush for president this November.

Last week, during an appearance in Pennsylvania, Bush let it be known that — among many things — he also will be the environmental president.

I'm sorry if I made you pee your pants with laughter, but it's true. It's also sad and bizarre. If you didn't pee yourself and need to go, do so now before you read the following quote from Bush's speech Monday.

"Every environmental issue confronts us with a duty to be good stewards," Bush said. "As we use nature's gifts, we must do so wisely. Prosperity will mean little if we leave future generations a world of polluted air, toxic lakes and rivers, and vanished forests."

If you don't understand why this is funny (or ironic or moronic), Texas is the most polluted state in the Union, according to Bob Herbert of The New York Times and the Sierra Club.

Bush's statement is equivalent to Adolf Hitler saying we should love and protect the Jews, or Joseph Stalin saying the best type of society is a capitalist democracy.

Bush now can add hypocrisy to his résumé.

In 1999, Texas had more smog alerts than any other state. Last year also was the year in which Houston surpassed Los Angeles as being the smoggiest city in the United States. This is despite the fact that the Houston metropolitan area is less populated than Los Angeles and not buffered by mountains that keep smog from blowing away, as is the case with LA.

As reported by the Sierra Club, Texas ranks first among all states in discharge of recognized carcinogens into the air. Texas ranks first among all states in the number of factories violating clean-water standards. Texas ranks first among all states in the injection of toxic waste into underground wells. Texas ranks first among all states in toxic chemical accidents.

According to the director of Public Citizen-Texas, Tom Smith, "What happened during Bush's tenure is that, by most measures, environmental quality in Texas has gotten worse." Smith also said, "Every chance that Bush has had, he's stood up for the polluters."

This is evident by Bush's first appointment to the Texas Natural Resources and Conservation Commission, the state's environmental protection agency. Bush's choice was Ralph Merquez, an ex-Monsanto Chemical Co. executive and ex-chairman of the environmental regulation committee to the Texas Chemical Council, a trade association.

Bob Herbert likened this to putting "the biggest, hungriest fox we can find right at the gaping entrance to the chicken coop."

Merquez has done an effective job for Bush. Three weeks into his appointment, Merquez foiled plans already in the works to issue smog-health advisories to the residents living in the Houston area when ozone levels became high. In November 1995, Merquez even testified before a Congressional committee that ozone wasn't particularly bad for you.

This action against smog alerts is contrary to the desires of many angry parents of the Houston suburb Deer Park. Last October, after repeated incidences in which student athletes under strenuous activity suffered from respiratory distress, including coughing fits and breathing difficulties, these parents demanded smog alerts be made known. In addition to Merquez's appointment, Bush's other solutions to clean up the air was to cancel an automobile pollution inspection program and to ask industries that pollute the atmosphere for their voluntary cooperation to reduce industrial emissions. (There's an action with some teeth in it.)

As reported in The Washington Post, between 1997 and 1998, Bush cut the budget for hazardous waste site cleanup from $44 million to $22 million.

To Bush's credit, he did sign laws that require older utility plants to reduce emissions and penalize others that don't meet pollution standards. However, this only is because Texas was mandated to do so by the federal Clean Air Act.

The Texas Clean Air Act contains a loophole that allows more than 800 of these older industrial plants to continue to operate with antiquated pollution controls.

The rules passed May 1999 only will end up penalizing a handful of aging plants if they don't reduce their emissions.

Bush also claimed to have cleaned up more than 450 brownfields (those abandoned and polluted weedy plots that blight many cities). I guess his developer friends don't have to build on contaminated property now that it's been cleaned up with public money.

Overall, Texas cleanup is the slowest in the nation.

It doesn't take much of an imagination to figure out what kind of environmental president Bush would be. For one, he opposes the UN's 1997 Kyoto protocol requiring industrialized countries to reduce greenhouse gas emissions.

Bush also supports oil exploration in the Alaska's Arctic National Wildlife Refuge, an unnecessary action. The only reason to explore the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge is to make money for the oil industry and to foul pristine environment, but one wouldn't expect less from someone whose daddy once set him up with a job with oil company buddies.

Meanwhile, Bush has been critical of Gore's environmental manifesto, "Earth in Balance," although he admits he never has read the book. At least Bush is an honest hypocrite.

As the compassionate conservative, Bush constantly asks us to judge him by his heart, but what about our hearts? Not to mention lungs and livers and kidneys and pancreases and lymph systems...

The Collegian's Reader Forum is an anonymous call-in system that allows readers to voice their opinions on any topic for 20 seconds.

The article on Darin Golay's death was poorly done. The Collegian seems to think that the deaths of KU and Texas students warrant more space than one of our own. You should show more respect for the great person Darin was and for how much his death is hurting those who knew him.

Coach Rovelto if the competition at the meet is so bad, then don't send us to them.

I found Ms. Fort's views on sending Elian home to be, basically, offensive. A woman gave her life that her son would have a chance at freedom and that seems to be swept under the rug right now.

The Royals are back.

A woman is raped every six minutes in the U.S., according to the FBI. How many rapes took place in the time you spent returning your movies? K-State women took back the night because of people with priorities like yours.

What's the deal with all of the fences around the Union? Are we getting a dog?

There are three types of people on campus: those who read the Collegian, those who don't read the Collegian and those who read the Campus Forum.

I agree. I think greek hazing violations should be printed in the Collegian so all of us know what is going on.

Hey, Ken, what are you talking about, "it's not a good time to be greek"? We run the entire campus, plus we're going to get all of our jobs handed to us.

The article in your paper today about the students at the power plant is filled with mistruths. Facilities needs to answer the true questions at hand.

Student workers losing their jobs at the power plant is a bad deal for everyone involved. The full-time employees don't want the students' shifts.

Aggieville stores offer vintage goods

By CHELSEA SCHMIDT
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The eyes and tails of the Kit Cat Klocks move back and forth in perfect synchronization as they peer over the variety of furniture, dishes and various other items for sale.

Upon scanning the room, customers see dinnerware, followed by colorful telephones and other vintage accessories.

Just next door, vintage clothing, wigs and other accessories top off the vintage experience.

Atomic Age and Deja Vu sit side-by-side on Moro Street in Aggieville. The focus of merchandise for these stores is vintage goods and clothing.

"It's something I've always wanted to do since I was young," Andrea Birdsell, owner of Deja Vu, said. "I've wanted to have my own store, and I opened it, and everything just fell in place."

Atomic Age opened May 1, 1999, and Deja Vu opened in mid-September.

Both stores feature vintage items and draw off each other for business.

"Theirs is mostly furniture, and mine is clothing," Birdsell said. "We complement each other with our inventory."

Elizabeth Wood, owner of Atomic Age, said she agreed.

"She was shopping one day and told me she was a vintage-clothing dealer," Wood said.

After discussion and encouragement, the two became friends and now share the same building and landlord.

"I worked in Kansas City at a store called Revue in Westport, and the only reason I came up here was to see what was available," Birdsell said. "She had opened, and the store I'm in now was up for rent. It was so perfect."

Both stores carry vintage items, and Wood said she primarily carries items from the 1920s to the 1970s with an emphasis on the 1950s.

"The '50s stuff is my favorite part," she said. "We have vintage dishes, lamps, furniture, watches and telephones."

Jason Brown, co-owner and Wood's husband, said his favorite collection of vintage items is the panther TV lamps.

"It's just a big ceramic panther with a light bulb behind it," he said. "You put it on the TV, and it's supposed to ease the strain on your eyes. We don't have them right now, but they're something that we do come across."

Wood said she also sells some new items, the most popular being Fiesta dinnerware.

"We sell vintage Fiesta and new," she said. "We have a better selection of Fiesta than anyone around. We can and will order anything available."

Although Wood sells a variety of items including vintage records, Kit Cat Klocks, dinnerware and furniture, she said the most popular items with college students are the ashtrays.

At Deja Vu, Birdsell said she sells items mostly from the 1950s-1970s to a specific demographic of shoppers.

"We get a really specific age group — usually high school up through college age. People over 30 really don't come in," she said. "Our wigs sell really well. We sell multicolored wigs, Afro wigs and short bobbed wigs that are different colors."

Birdsell also has a variety of clothing, hats, shoes, scarves and other accessories for sale.

"I can't really put my finger on one specific item that is the most popular," she said.

Both Birdsell and Wood attended K-State, and Wood earned a master's degree in geography in 1996. Brown also is a K-State graduate in geography.

Atomic Age is open Monday through Saturday from 11 a.m. to 6 p.m. Deja Vu is open Tuesday through Saturday from noon to 7 p.m.

"It was definitely a career move for me," Birdsell said. "It's something I've always wanted to do."

Brown also said he enjoys co-owning a vintage store.

"I like having the opportunity to see stuff that comes in and unite people with something they love," he said.

ABOVE: Andrea Birdsell, Deja Vu owner, said she opened her vintage clothing store because there is nothing like it in the area. LEFT: Items from the 1920s to 1970s comprise the merchandise Elizabeth Wood carries in her Aggieville store, Atomic Age.

'Jeopardy!' champion to present speech tonight on memory, learning skills

By NATALIA FARMER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Training to become a five-time "Jeopardy!" champion helped improve his memory.

Bob Harris went undefeated on the game show five times. In November 1997, 25 million people were watching as he won more than $100,000 in cash and prizes.

At 7 tonight, Harris will lecture on memory and learning skills. The free lecture, sponsored by Union Program Council, will be in the Ballroom, on the second floor.

Heide McBride, UPC program adviser, said the lecture will contain information that will help students remember issues and ideas effectively.

"There are going to be great tips and techniques for exams that are really helpful," she said.

Harris has been nominated five times as Lecturer of the Year by Campus Activities Today magazine. He has performed almost 300 lectures at 215 colleges nationwide since 1992. His lecture topics range from the history of the civil-rights movement, to campaign-finance reform, to memory and learning skills.

An Associated Press award-winning syndicated radio humorist and commentator, Harris has a daily radio commentary.

"This is Bob Harris," which is featured on more than 75 stations nationwide.

In 1998, Harris received an award for Best Radio Feature by the AP Television and Radio Association for his humorous and critical journalistic daily reports. Before this, Harris spent five years performing in clubs as a stand-up comedian.

He is the author of "Steal This Book And Get Life Without Parole," and his weekly column, "The Scoop," is carried by numerous alternative news weeklies and online by Mother Jones.

Janet Bozarth, UPC Issues and Ideas committee chairwoman, said Harris was chosen because of his previous success at K-State. She said the timeliness of his topic also played a part in scheduling him before finals.

"He caught our attention so much when he gave his JFK presentation," she said. "It was a big hit because he was so entertaining, and his humor really kept the crowd into it."

Bozarth said she was eager to hear

Harris' secrets on memorization because of his varied background.

"He's a very smart man because he has experienced so much in his life," she said. "I can't wait to see what he has to say about remembering quickly and efficiently under stress."

The UPC Issues and Ideas Committee is responsible for bringing Harris' lecture to K-State. The group is involved with the concerns of the campus community and present in-depth educational programs of interest to students.

K-State's all-time sack leader could be late 1st-round NFL pick

By RICHARD SMITH
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It took Darren Howard four years to amass 29.5 sacks, which place him at the top of K-State's all-time list.

That is a far cry from Reggie White's all-time NFL record of 192.5 sacks, but the former K-State defensive end will begin his push toward becoming the new "Minister of Defense" when his name is called during the NFL Draft in New York this weekend.

Howard, a 6-foot, 3-inch, 272-pound behemoth, is the highest-rated of the four or five Wildcats expected to find employers during the annual selection meetings this weekend.

On the list of defensive ends, Howard sits third or fourth, with Penn State's Courtney Brown, Tennessee's Shaun Ellis, and Virginia Tech's John Engelberger generally listed ahead of him.

Howard is criticized in some scouting reports for having average size, strength and speed measurements. Yet he's consistently projected as a late first-round pick.

Howard was unavailable for comment for this story, as he has spent the week at his family's home in Florida attending to last-minute draft preparations and working out for NFL teams.

However, former teammate Jarrod Cooper had plenty to say about Howard's status as a potential first-round pick.

"Darren is that good," Cooper said. "In college, he looked like a man playing with kids. Every time he wanted to do something, he did it. Teams would double- and triple-team him. They'd have to change their whole offensive scheme so they could get around this guy. He's a man."

K-State freshman defensive end Andrew Shull, who spent the past year scrutinizing Howard's play and learning the ropes from him, agreed that Howard is a legitimate NFL prospect.

"Darren is probably the most athletic guy I've ever seen play football," Shull said. "He's fast, he's big, he's strong and he's got great hips and really quick feet."

As the offseason began, some scouts were slow to appreciate that characteristic.

In college, Howard took up residence in Big 12 quarterbacks' nightmares in 1997 and 1998, amassing 21.5 sacks and dominating games. However, his sack production fell to 5.5 due to constant double- and triple-teaming in his senior season, and his draft stock followed suit.

As the off-season has progressed, though, solid combine and individual workouts along with Howard's versatility and ability to flat-out play the game have vaulted him into what most draft experts would call a late first-round pick.

The Sporting News has Howard going to the San Francisco 49ers with the 24th pick.

"A natural playmaker with a feel for the position," the magazine said of Howard. "Lacks great strength and speed, but flair as pass rusher makes him attractive."

CNN.com has Howard going to the Seattle Seahawks with the 19th pick, while ESPN's Mel Kiper Jr. and Pro Football Weekly both show him falling into the top of the second round.

HIGH hopes

Younger Cats step up as team prepares for next season

STORY BY MICHAEL NOLL

The Big 12 Conference had better watch out.

The K-State volleyball team ended the 1999 season ranked No. 19 in the nation and fourth in possibly the toughest volleyball conference in the nation — and returns all but one starter from K-State's best season in school history.

Now the team has set its sights on the Big 12 title and beyond.

"We are definitely looking to win the Big 12 right now," senior middle blocker Kelle Branting said. "Last year our goal was the Sweet 16, and we fell one short of that, so we're aiming for that again."

Head coach Jim McLaughlin said he has set his sights even higher.

"We want to increase the standard of play that we want to reach, whether it be the Final Four or the Elite Eight," he said.

Such high standards certainly are not out of place for a team that lost just one starter from a squad that knocked off perennial power Nebraska for the first time ever.

Granted, that one lost starter was All-American outside hitter Dawn Cady. But her position as team All-American could be taken by two players this year, junior setter Disney Bronnenberg and junior outside hitter Liz Wegner.

To do so, however, will require a tremendous amount of hard work, McLaughlin said.

"I expect greatest things out of Disney this year," McLaughlin said. "She had a great season last year, but she's got a ways to go."

Wegner received similar praise from last year's Big 12 Coach of the Year.

"I want her to be an All-American," McLaughlin said. "Sometimes it's tough for her, but I wouldn't ask her to do it if I didn't think she could."

The road to being named one of the nation's elite might be made somewhat easier for Wegner, however. The hole left by Cady's graduation has quickly been claimed by sophomore Jenny Pollard and junior Lisa Mimick.

Pollard and Mimick have done so well, in fact, that their play is allowing other players to return to their natural positions.

"Lisa Mimick and Jenny Pollard are just doing a great job right now," Branting said. "They're doing so well right now that we have kind of played around with the lineup a little bit, of putting Liz back on the right side, because she's so good back there."

The circumstances would appear to give the Cats an easy ride to a Big 12 Championship, with only fine-tuning necessary. In reality, though, K-State has several areas McLaughlin said the team needs to address.

"We need to get better at siding out," McLaughlin said. "We want to have more options. If the opponent has to think about more, it slows down their reactions."

Specifically, the Cats will have to rely less on their outside hitters in crunch time, junior middle blocker Jayne Christen said.

"When in doubt, we went outside last year because we knew we had hitters that could put the ball away, so sometimes they would just send two blockers out there right away," Christen said.

As a result of this dependency on the outside, K-State became one-faceted and more easily stopped on offense, Branting said.

"We put a lot of pressure on them to be good day in and day out," Branting said. "If they had a bad night, the team had a bad night, and so we can't really continue doing that playing in the best conference in the nation."

In addition to ball distribution, other areas have undergone scrutiny also, McLaughlin said.

"On defense, we need to dig more balls and develop more range, and we need to upgrade our serving and passing," McLaughlin said.

The speed needed to develop more range might be found in the incoming freshman class. As one example, Cari Jensen, an outside/middle hitter from Fowler, Colo., was a two-time Gatorade National High School Volleyball player of the year. All four freshmen in the incoming class exhibit speed and athleticism, McLaughlin said.

"They're physical, and they're fast," McLaughlin said. "It will just depend on how fast they learn the system and understand the demands of the system."

All four freshmen might have the talent to make immediate contributions to the team, Branting said.

"They'll have the talent to do it," Branting said. "But there's always a gap when you come in as freshman as to where you need to catch up to, and we're trying to make that gap pretty big right now to force them to improve at a higher rate."

Cats take 10th in respective tournaments

By DEREK BOSS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Although the K-State men's and women's golf squads traveled to different cities this week, they had something in common Tuesday.

Both teams finished 10th in their respective tournaments and used their final day of competition to make an upward move in the field.

On the women's side, the Wildcats knocked 18 strokes off Monday's second-round total to improve their finish at the Suzie Maxwell Berning Classic in Norman, Okla., on Sunday through Tuesday.

After 36 holes, K-State sat in 11th place after rounds of 330 and 336, but Tuesday's team score of 318 jumped the Cats one spot in the standings and elevated their three-day total to 984.

The squad was led by freshman Miranda Smith, who shot rounds of 78 in her first and final days of competition en route to a 13th-place finish.

"Miranda had a solid day," K-State women's head coach Kristi Knight said. "She felt like it could have been a little better. She didn't putt very well, but I think all-in-all, it was a pretty solid day for her."

Freshman Elise Carpentier added a 28th-place tie to the Cat cause, firing 79s on Sunday and Tuesday of the competition. However, it was her 86 on Monday, played in 30 mph winds, that dropped her in the field.

"Elise had two bad holes that blew up her round Monday afternoon," Knight said. "She had a quadruple bogey and a double bogey on the front nine of her second round. So she played pretty well with the exception of a few holes."

Sophomore Edie Murdoch was the only other K-State golfer to finish in the top 50, posting a three-day mark of 249, good for a 44th place tie.

Nebraska won the 13-team tournament with a score of 930, while the Big 12 Conference swept the leaderboard in the top-five team places.

Meanwhile, on the men's side, K-State competed in the Diet Pepsi/Shocker Classic Monday and Tuesday at the Crestview Country Club in Wichita.

The Cats moved up two slots Tuesday after a 12th place effort in first round action.

K-State notched a 311 in Monday's first 18 holes, but countered with a 302 to round out the day's competition.

On Tuesday, men's head coach Tim Norris' squad stayed in tune with a final-round 303 to surpass both Southwest Missouri State and Missouri in the tournament field.

Sophomore Bryan Milberger led the Cats, shooting a 75-74-76 to post a 14th place tie. It marks the third top-15 finish this season for the U.S. Amateur qualifier, as well as the sixth time he's led K-State individually.

Milberger was complemented in the event by a 28th-place tie from senior Mark Sears, in addition to sophomores Matt Williams and Scott McNeely's ties for 42nd and 45th, respectively.

Arkansas State won the 15-team tournament over host Wichita State.

Next, the women will take a week off until the Big 12 Championships on April 20-23 in Lubbock, Texas, while the men will return to action Sunday in Columbia, Mo., when they face the Missouri Tigers in the Cat Fight.

NFL Draft predictions for K-State players vary depending on source MONDAY: Sources close to the situation report reader confusion in the 2000 NFL Draft story on the Collegian front page.

VIEWPOINT

DEREK BOSS

Suspect: Derek Boss, armed and dangerous.

After failing to mention the other four Wildcats in addition to Mark Simoneau on Monday, for reasons that will remain undisclosed (frankly, because it would take too long to explain and unravel), I'll attempt to rectify the situation and take the liberty of providing you with the wanted information.

For the record, today I am about to unveil the "mystery" that had been lingering in many of your minds after Monday's mishap. I am prepared, after careful planning and a few sleepless nights, to divulge the names of the other four Wildcats.

Drum roll, please.

Defensive end Darren Howard
Offensive/defensive lineman Damion McIntosh

Cornerback Lamar Chapman.

Running back Frank Murphy (I've bolded them for clarity.)

All four of these athletes, in addition to Simoneau, have legitimate chances of being selected in the seven rounds of Saturday's and Sunday's NFL Draft.

But while I'm here, I might as well give you the lowdown on where they might land this weekend.

Howard, at 6 feet 3 inches and 272 pounds, is a favorite to go late in the first round, although ESPN's Mel Kiper Jr. thinks he might fall to the first or second pick of round two. However, others have him going much higher, including CNN.com's prediction for Howard going at No. 19 overall to the Seattle Seahawks and The Sporting News' rating as the 24th pick to the San Francisco 49ers.

So while Howard and Simoneau's prospective draft positions look bright, the other three Wildcats will be waiting in the wings, hoping for a Sunday phone call announcing their selection in the draft.

McIntosh could land as high as the third or fourth round according to Pro Football Weekly, but several other draft analysts such as Kiper, Jr. expect him to be picked up in the late sixth or early seventh round. However, his 5.11 speed in the 40-yard dash, as well as his size at 6 feet 3 inches and 326 pounds, could determine whether he's selected for offensive or defensive line duties.

At Tuesday's press conference at the Vanier Football Complex, only NFL Draft prospects McIntosh and Simoneau were in attendance to talk to the news media about their experiences thus far in the draft process.

Chapman and Murphy did not attend for reasons unreported, while Howard was busy working out with NFL clubs as well as spending time at his home in St. Petersburg, Fla.

At the conference, McIntosh said his agent told him to expect a selection anywhere from the second to fourth round of the draft.

The lineman said he has worked out with teams such as the New York Jets, San Francisco, Detroit, Carolina, Cleveland and New England. He said his workout at the NFL Combine should help his chances in the draft. According to CNN.com, McIntosh boasts 23 reps of 225 pounds on bench press and notches a vertical jump of 26 inches.

Meanwhile, Chapman, who played strong safety for the Wildcats at the collegiate level, has switched to cornerback in an attempt to provide more appeal to NFL scouts. His 6-foot, 175-pound frame and 4.50 second also could elevate him to a third or fourth round selection according to Pro Football Weekly, but Kiper Jr. expects him to wait until the seventh round.

In addition, Murphy also is picked to be drafted late, but the collegiate running back might switch to wide receiver duties if he wishes to make a pro roster. His 6-foot-1-inch frame, blazing 4.22 speed and 42-inch vertical jump might be more suitable for that position.

In fact, Murphy played wide receiver at Itawamba Community College out of high school and occasionally lined up there during his Wildcat career.

Well, now you've been informed, so if you're lounging around this Saturday or Sunday afternoon, flip on the old TV set and check out how our fellow K-Staters fare in the draft.

That is, now that you know all five of their names.

The Cryptoclip is a substitution cipher in which one letter stands for another. If you think that X equals O, it will equal O throughout the puzzle. Single letters, short words and words using an apostrophe give you clues to locating vowels. Solution is by trial and error.

Helen Brockman's cookbook, "The Brockman House Cookbook," is a collection of her recipes and cooking tips. Brockman signed cookbooks April 2 at a release party at Amelia's Home Ambience and will be signing cookbooks there from 1 to 4 p.m. Saturday.

Master Cook

Local woman shows her flair for food in 'The Brockman House Cookbook'

It might have come from her Iowa roots, or maybe it was the 35 years she spent in New York City. It definitely was not directly from her mother.

Helen Brockman has been cooking for most of her 97 years of life, but she said she was not sure when or where she first began cooking.

"I assume I've been cooking all my life," Brockman said. "My mother didn't teach me a whole lot. She knew a lot and she cooked magnificently, and I think by osmosis I learned what a good cook was."

Half of the 152 pages of Brockman's cookbook, "The Brockman House Cookbook," are full of recipes, and the other half is full of information needed to best prepare them. All of the recipes and illustrations are Brockman's work.

"One part is just education — what's good and why it's good," Brockman said. "Young people have no idea what they need when it comes to house-keeping. These are the things in my kitchen, right down to why you need these different kinds of knives."

Brockman said the book provides all of the information necessary for any cook of any level.

"Someone once said there's everything in it except, 'Approach the stove,'" she said.

Teresa Rickel-McMillin, owner of Amelia's Home Ambience and Rickel-McMillin Retail Liquor, said she heard of the cookbook through a friend, who knew Brockman. The friend thought Rickel-McMillin and her husband, Mark, would like the recipes.

"A lot of the recipes in the book call for alcohol," Rickel-McMillin said. "We have a mutual friend and she thought I would be interested in the cookbook since I own the liquor store." Even though this is the fifth edition of the cookbook, it is the first time it has been available for sale.

When Rickel-McMillin first opened Amelia's, Brockman gave her the rights to the book.

"After we opened Amelia's, she gifted the cookbook to us," Rickel-McMillin said. "She always used it to give away to her friends, but she's never sold it."

Brockman said the cookbook is a compilation of recipes, including some she created when traveling and after staying with her sister. Many of them are recipes she still uses when entertaining guests, and Brockman said it would be impossible to select just one as her favorite.

"If I could have only one recipe from this book, I don't know. I just like to eat too well," Brockman said. "I think for Teresa, the reason she took on the cookbook, was because of the baked pork chops."

The cookbook is available for sale at Amelia's and at Varney's Book Store, but Rickel-McMillin said she would like for more businesses to carry the book in the future.

Proceeds from the sale of the book go to the Molly M. Rickel Research Library. Rickel-McMillin said the library is a non-profit library for patients to gather information about diseases such as cancer, AIDS and diabetes.

Rickel-McMillin said since the book became available for sale a couple of weeks ago, sales have been better than expected.

"We expected people who know her to buy it, but people are just coming off the street and buying the cookbook," she said.

"A lot of people are buying it for gifts. Last Saturday a lady bought it for her grandmother who is turning 96. She thought it would be a great inspiration."

Variety of food groups available at campus halls

By CHELSEA SCHMIDT
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

Finding the basic food groups on the K-State campus shouldn't be too much of a problem.

Foods from the dairy, bread and meat groups are produced on campus and are sold throughout the week.

CALL HALL

Call Hall has been producing dairy foods for as long as plant manager Sri Adapa can remember.

"In the past, it used to be in Waters Hall," Adapa said. "They had a retail sales counter until 1923. In 1964, the new facility was built here in Call Hall."

The products produced and sold in Call come from K-State's cattle.

"We have our own dairy farm with about 200 Holstein cows," Adapa said. "All the milk comes from our dairy farm."

The dairy farm and processing plant are part of the Department of Animal Sciences and Industry and are about two miles north near Marlatt Avenue.

The milk produced by the cattle is used to process a number of products, including fluid milk, cheese, different flavors of ice cream and butter. Six types of cheese are made, including cheddar, Colby, Monterey Jack, pepper Jack, processed and New York sharp.

"We sell our products through the sales counter and also supply fluid milk and ice cream to the housing on campus," Adapa said.

The sales counter is in Call Hall, adjacent to the processing center.

"We get students, faculty, staff and residents of Manhattan who buy our products," Adapa said. "We have full-time people employed by the state that make all the products that we sell."

The food produced also is used to participate in dairy-processing research projects, Adapa said.

"We offer different daily-processing-related classes, and students come and learn how the equipment works," Adapa said. "It's firsthand experience and more practical when looking for a job."

However, Adapa said anything tagged as research material is not sold.

"The purpose of the unit is for teaching, research and extension work," he said.

SHELLENBERGER HALL

After indulging in the recommended dairy intake, Shellenberger Hall can provide the daily requirement of grain products produced in the Department of Grain Science and Industry.

"The types of bread we make vary from week to week," said Marvin Willyard, Baker's National Education Foundation professor. "We also make cookies every week, muffins, sweet rolls and cinnamon rolls. We mix it up a little to give customers some variety."

All of the products are produced by students in the Bakery Science Club.

"Students use the funds to fund club activities and fund expenses of students to go to the annual trade conventions," Willyard said.

The two main trade conventions include the American Society of Bakers in Chicago last month, and the Retail Baker's Association, also last month, in Washington, D.C.

"It's an opportunity for students to go on trips to interact with people in the industry," Willyard said. "They are neat trips."

All grain products are sold on the first floor of Shellenberger from 3 to 5 p.m. Wednesdays.

"Most of the ingredients are donated from food companies," Willyard said. "Those not donated, the students purchase."

WEBER HALL

K-State's meat lab in Weber Hall can help to satisfy the protein component, and provide the main ingredients for many main courses.

"We have beef, pork, lamb, roast, steaks, ground beef, ground pork, ham and bacon," John Wolf, meat lab manager, said.

All of the meat comes from cattle and hogs located on a farm north of campus. The work is done by students in classes or by students working hourly.

"The students do all of the fabrication, processing and manufacturing of the products," Wolf said.

There are about 18 students, and they sell the products every Wednesday from 3 to 6 p.m. and Friday from 12 to 6 p.m. in Weber 166.

Wolf said he mostly sees students, faculty and staff purchasing the meat products, but they also are available to the public.

concerns that there was no accountability for the administration, he said. From his experience, Frieman said he thought the problem stemmed from a shortage of resources.

Coffman said, in some cases, follow-up was essential.

To eliminate the perception of conflict of interest between the affirmative action office and the administration, the task force recommended the office be moved out of Anderson Hall.

"There is the perception that the affirmative action office works too closely to the administration," Brad Fenwick, task-force member, said.

Coffman said he thought it was just a perception.

"Any time you have offices that are immediately juxtaposed, that perception could develop," he said.

Ben Hopper, Student Senate representative to Faculty Senate, said he thought the recommendation to clarify the duties of the affirmative action office and publicize the office would help students.

"I think there could be students on campus that have been discriminated against who may not have any idea who to go to and where to go to," he said.

The report probably will be referred to another Faculty Senate committee. The provost will continue to look at the recommendation, but he said the earliest any changes would be made was this fall.

"This report is not saying that the affirmative action office has done a bad job," Gray said. "The perception is that there are needs that are not being met."

show when they walk through the doors of Bramlage, Muller said, with the Wills and McBride crews totting a large amount of equipment.

"The real exciting thing is that this is a top-notch performer, and it will be a great performance in terms of the technological aspects. She's bringing three large video screens, and her husband, John McBride, is the production manager for Garth Brooks," Muller said.

"It's going to be a wonderful production in addition to a great duo of performers. People are going to get their money's worth."

KXKB-FM 104.7, the radio sponsor for the event, will be using most of today to distribute prizes to loyal listeners, said Clay Daniels, program director and co-host of the station's morning show.

"We've got a pair of backstage passes for Martina McBride and a pair of passes for Mark Wills for the person with the most creative sign," Daniels said.

"The criteria are that B104 must be on the sign and it must say the name of the artist."

Disc jockeys for the station will be on hand at the west doors of Bramlage starting at 2 p.m. today in order to distribute McBride compact discs and other B104.7 prizes, Daniels said.

"We're going to give away tickets all day, and drive around and do sticker stops," he said.

"We stick to the main roads and the busier roads. We drive around Fort Riley Boulevard quite a bit, and Blumont and Anderson avenue."

understand it, Conrad said.

Enrollment has increased the past few years, so students might ask why privilege fees increase when K-State has more students paying.

Walker said that when there are more students, there is an added strain to the services funded by privilege fees — more staff, more merchandise.

"We have to make it possible for them to still provide services," he said.

Worcester said extra students help keep the cost per student low while still increasing funding for services.

"As we look at all the agencies, we're seeing inflationary increases so we have to give them more money," he said.

One thing Walker said he would like to do to help students understand their fee better is to include with their tuition bills a breakdown of where their privilege fee is going.

"Hopefully, we can do this for the upcoming tuition bill," he said.

Worcester said he liked this idea. "It's a simple step in the right direction," he said.

Worcester said he thought more students were becoming educated on the privilege fees.

"As the cost of education increases and students become more aware of added costs, students become more concerned about their fees and where their money is going," he said.

Worcester said that although there were probably good reasons behind the decisions to fund each entity with privilege fees, there does come a point in time when they need to be critically evaluated to see if the money still is being used appropriately.

"I believe there are some that are on that 'should be paying for that' borderline," he said. "We need to take a good look at those."

Worcester also said that although students have a responsibility to help fund some of the services on campus, there comes a time when individuals who use the services have to take responsibility and start paying in.

If students have any questions about privilege fees, Worcester said they can come to the Office of Student Activities and Services on the ground floor of the K-State Student Union and talk to him.

"I want students to know they can always seek out that information here at the SGA office," he said. "I'm always willing to talk to students about privilege fees, because I have strong feelings about them."

Special Olympians to compete

By GINA KOHAKE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Those with mental disabilities are not restricted from participating in physical activities, Debbie Devenuto, Special Olympics director for Special Olympics of Kansas, said.

Cycling, powerlifting and aquatics are the events scheduled for the Special Olympics event Saturday at Ahearn Field House.

The Special Olympics is an opportunity for mentally challenged people ages 8 and up to challenge themselves, said Don Gier, State Special Olympics chairman for the Kiwanis.

"These kids take great pride in medals that they win," Gier said. "You can see the tremendous success that the kids feel with their medals at the end. They are ecstatic because they have accomplished something for themselves."

The event at Ahearn will include teams from the northeastern and northcentral parts of the state, and it will begin around 9 in the morning and last until mid-afternoon.

"Special Olympics increases the level of confidence and physical ability for these kids," Gier said. "Five years ago, one little girl I worked with was walking the 25-meter assisted race. Now she is able to walk the 400-meter race by herself."

Participating in the weekend's events allows the athletes to be qualified for the state competition June 2-4 in Wichita, Devenuto said.

"These events mean everything to them," she said. "Not only do they get physical exercise, but they can be social. They are among their peers and competing in sports with people of equal ability."

Devenuto said Special Olympics can be as meaningful for volunteers as it is for the participants.

"I think it gives people awareness," Devenuto said.

Circle K International, a nonprofit service organization at K-State, will be volunteering at the event, said Danette Gaitros, president of Circle K International.

"We were looking for a service project where all of the group could participate," said Erin Powell, past lieutenant governor for the north division of the Kansas division of Circle K. "We have done Special Olympics events in the past, and they have been really great."

The northeast area of Special Olympics also has organized the K-State Bowl-A-Thon on Sunday, an event that allows special athletes to interact with K-State athletes.

"It is a one day event where the K-State athletes divide up into groups of three and participate in bowling with a Special Olympics athlete," Devenuto said.

Circle K chapter volunteers to aid campus, community

By KELLY EVENSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Although relatively unknown, Circle K International continues to help the campus and community.

Danette Gaitros, president of K-State's chapter of Circle K, said the organization has been present on campus since 1962 and concentrates on projects focusing on children, the elderly, the environment and the campus. She said the nonprofit group tries to help wherever it can and is good for people who want to do service and meet new people.

"This organization is great for meeting new people and gives students a chance to feel like they belong," Gaitros said. "It allows students to branch out from their own college and major to give them the opportunity to help."

Two projects Circle K is working on are assisting the Sunset Zoological Park with its Earth Day activities and the Special Olympics at Ahearn Field House on Saturday. Gaitros said group members will be working with the zoo carnival by doing fun, environment-focused activities.

Lacie Dunn, club historian and district bulletin editor, said the carnival table will allow children to play a "Wheel of Fortune"-style game while answering important questions about Earth Day.

"We are role models for these children," Dunn said. "By providing service projects for them, it shows them that when they become our age, they can also provide service to the community while being fun at the same time."

Gaitros said Circle K has been working with Special Olympics for several years. She said the people participating in the event will be doing activities such as swimming and weight lifting, and the volunteers will have the opportunity to help others.

"Helping with the Special Olympics shows that we can help other people and realize what we have in our lives," Gaitros said. "It gives us a chance to give back to the community and this program."

Karen Bowser, former president of Circle K, said students can continue to help the community and receive something back in return through these projects.

"A lot of this can be taken back into feeling like we helped somebody during our free time," Bowser said. "It enables someone to see how their help affects someone — to have someone smile back at you is the best feeling in the world."

Circle K is the world's largest collegiate service organization. The group is a branch of Kiwanis International and has chapters known as Key Clubs in high schools and Builders Clubs in junior high schools.

The organization focuses on developing leadership and friendship and encompasses almost 500 clubs in 12 countries. The organization also has a goal of completing 850 volunteer hours by the end of the year. K-State's chapter already has completed 776 hours.

Dunn said she thinks the work accomplished in Circle K is important because it allows its members to get into the community and work with and get to know many different people.

"This organization gets students out into the public, and working with kids is a big part of that," Dunn said. "We get a lot of hands-on work experience through the group, and it is fun to get to know people and provide for the community."

K-State's Circle K chapter works with many Manhattan organizations such as the Manhattan Emergency Shelter, the Boys and Girls Club, Big Brothers and Big Sisters of Manhattan Inc. and Wharton Manor. The organization has eight chapters in Kansas, including the University of Kansas, Washburn University, Emporia State University and Bethel College.

Gaitros said although Circle K is not well-known on campus, it still provides students with all kinds of interests and personalities the opportunity to help their community and get to know people throughout campus and the country.

"This is a growing experience because it lets students meet people from other schools and have fun while helping their community and campus," Gaitros said. "It is an organization where they can be themselves, have fun and relax while getting away from studying and homework."

AIR FORCE ROTC

Are you a:
• Freshman
• Sophomore
• Junior/Senior with 2 academic years to go starting fall semester

Air Force ROTC is an elective — but it's far more than that. Air Force ROTC is also a program that teaches you to be a leader, develops your management skills, and helps you grow into a well-rounded and self-assured person. For those who qualify, Air Force ROTC can even help pay for college through its scholarship programs. When you graduate, you'll also become an Air Force officer doing exciting, meaningful things alongside other great people in fascinating places around the world. If you're interested, it's not too late to join. There's no obligation — as a matter of fact, you don't have to decide to join the military until your junior year. So go ahead, give it a try — you won't regret it.

Trash audit at Durland Hall shows need for recycling

EVAN SEMON/COLLEGIAN

Members of Students For Environmental Action pick through two days worth of trash from Durland Hall to get a numerical statistic on the amount of recyclable materials thrown away. John Woods, director of Facility Services, and Amy Dix, junior in biochemistry and SEA chair, weigh the recyclable material that will be taken to Howie's Recycling Inc.

Armed only with thin plastic gloves, members of Students For Environmental Action picked through two days worth of trash from Durland Hall in search of recyclable items.

Besides trying to prove the need for recycling bins in the building, the group was conducting a trash audit so they could see how the university compares with the rest of the nation in the area of unnecessary trash.

"We were trying to get a numerical statistic on the amount of recyclable materials we throw away," said Amy Dix, junior in biochemistry and SEA chairwoman.

Dix said the group started with 12 to 15 bags of trash, and after the long process of sorting through the refuse was over, only two bags remained.

"Like the national statistic, approximately 75 percent of the trash was actually recyclable," said Sarah Glaser, senior in biology and environmental science. "This means that if Americans would recycle all municipal wastes, it would mean 75 percent less trash."

The majority of the trash was separated into categories such as paper, plastic, aluminum, glass and cardboard. John Woods, director of Facility Services, said these materials will go to Howie's Recycling Inc., where they are broken down for reuse.

Glaser said SEA hopes to bring awareness to the amount of trash that actually can be saved by means of recycling.

"It demonstrates to the university how wasteful we are," Glaser said.

"By consolidating the waste on a large scale, a person can see how just a little makes a difference."

Joseph Pingnot, senior in physics, said much of the trash accumulation across campus could be prevented if everyone made an effort.

"The dorm trash chutes are always overflowing," Pingnot said. "There is no reason for it, a lot of that could be avoided if we all recycled more." Dix said the group also is petitioning Student Governing Association for a $25 increase in the privilege fee to provide a budget for recycling on campus.

"Crews go around daily and pick up the recycling bins, but we don't have money for it," Woods said. "It comes out of the custodial budget."

The group will be at Sunset Zoological Park on Saturday to celebrate Earth Day, April 22. They hope to reach out to children through explaining compost piles and allowing them to plant seeds in soil.

"We want to tone it down for the kids so that they will say to mommy and daddy 'Why aren't we doing this?'" Dix said. "Ultimately, it should start with us, but we need to teach the younger generations."

Country SHOWCASE

STORY BY REED DUNN ■ PHOTOS BY JUSTIN HAYWORTH

Three-year-old Drew Casper of Manhattan watches as Martina McBride performs during her Thursday-night concert at Bramlage Coliseum. Casper got a chance to kiss McBride but shied away at the last minute backstage, though he did get his poster signed.

McBride, Willis entertain audience in Bramlage

With his black-felt hat and red short-sleeved shirt, he tightly grasped the cardboard sign in his hands. "I wanna kiss Martina," the sign read in black ink over big red lips.

Drew Casper, three-year-old Manhattan resident, was waiting with his parents, Dave and Connie, when he was handed two passes for the chance many others missed. The passes were for backstage access to meet one of his favorite country stars, Martina McBride.

"He was pretty excited," Dave Casper said. "He wanted to go see Martina. That was the goal, so he was pretty fired up."

As far as the proposition to kiss the country star, Drew passed on his chance.

"She did offer to give him a kiss," Dave Casper said. "She leaned her cheek toward him, but he shied away and buried his head in my neck."

Mark Willis, Academy of Country Music's 1999 top new male vocalist, opened the Thursday-night concert with his song, "Back at One."

After the song, he said he was excited about opening the show for one of country music's best female singers.

"She is awesome," Willis said. He filled the next 40 minutes with such songs as "Jacob's Ladder," "Don't Laugh at Me" and his latest single, "Almost Doesn't Count."

After Willis' set, crews made changes to the stage, preparing the Bramlage Coliseum audience for the showcase artist. The busy crowd fell silent as the lights faded to black.

Green and purple beams glinted over the smoke-filled stage in synchronization of the band's sound. A staircase in the middle of the stage lifted, and the audience began to cheer again. Seconds later, McBride stood in the cloud of smoke wearing a black tank-top and pants. Stage lights reflected off the silver stripes in her pants as she began to sing "It's My Time" from her new album, "Emotion."

The native Kansan finished the song and greeted her fans.

"It's great to be back home in Kansas," McBride said.

She said since the first time she was in Manhattan to record a song at the age of 7, she has had the opportunity to perform for thousands of people. Included in the performances of her career was the opportunity to sing for President Clinton.

"I was 8 1/2 months pregnant, so I figured I was safe," she said. "A girl's gotta think these things out."

Carmin Elliott, junior in pre-veterinary medicine, said the concert was an opportunity to bond with her little sister, Johanna Elliott, freshman in early childhood education, before her sister leaves to spend the summer as a nanny in Connecticut.

"I won't get to see her this summer," Carmin Elliott said. "I'm not a big, huge country fan, but I do like Martina's songs."

"When Johanna found out I got her the tickets, she listened to all of her CDs so she could sing along."

Even though the event was the first concert Carmin Elliott had seen, it was not the first for her sister. It was the second time the McBride fan had been given tickets as a gift.

"For my 16th birthday, I got to go to her concert," Johanna Elliott said.

After McBride sang a few other songs, including "Anything's Better Than Feelin' The Blues" and "Wild Angel," the Elliott sisters made their

Police arrest man for drug possession

Police swarmed a house Thursday night at about 10 p.m. with a search warrant at 908 Claflin Road, resulting in one arrest.

The suspect is being charged with possession of controlled substances. There are now three other suspects.

Upon arrival, the Riley County Police Department found one suspect ill. He was treated at the scene but declined hospital treatment.

After the police had arrived at the scene, the three other suspects arrived at the house. Authorities said the three were visitors to the house.

The police had learned through an investigation earlier in that day and from another previous investigation about the house and illegal activities possibly occurring within, said Capt. John Doehling of the RCPD.

"One thing lead to another," Doehling said.

Doehling declined to comment on whether the previous seven arrests made Monday at 404 S. 18th St. were related to Thursday night's arrest.

The police declined further comments concerning the search and arrest.

Local representative files for re-election

By DANICA COTO
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Four years of experience is the reason why Rep. Jeff Peterson, R-Manhattan, has filed for re-election.

The other reason is that he graduated from K-State in the early 1990s and is no stranger to Manhattan.

"It's a natural fit to have a graduate of the university in that position, that can relate well to folks in the district," he said. "I believe so much in the community of Manhattan."

One of Peterson's key issues is education, he said, because such a large part of his constituency in Manhattan is in K-State.

In addition, equitable funding for all of the Manhattan-Ogden USD 383 school district is an important area, he said.

Peterson had supported a decision to restore a promised funding increase to public schools and their right to higher education resources.

There also was a budget that passed out in the House of Representatives that would fund the higher-education reform act and significantly enhance funding to regent institutions, he said.

Although he said he hopes to see the final budget to pass on that, there are limiting factors.

"Each year you have a new budget battle, and you have to work to preserve the budget recommendations," he said.

Peterson said another important issue is diversifying the Manhattan

Football standouts have tense nerves for weekend

By RICHARD SMITH
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Mark Simoneau has been waiting for this weekend for most of his life.

From trying to elude his brothers in games of living room football as a child, to Saturday nights in high school spent running laps on a track in his native Smith Center, Kan., to his days in K-State purple. He has sweated and bled and sacrificed for it. He has paid his dues. He is ready.

Now he must tolerate the waiting.

"I'm trying not to lose sleep," he said. "I've had bad dreams... that I didn't get drafted."

This weekend, Simoneau and four other K-State football standouts will have to spend hours on end enduring the kind of nerves, tension and uncertainty usually only experienced by brain surgeons, trapeze artists and New York City cab passengers.

This weekend they will find out whether they will make it to the National Football League. The two-day, seven-round NFL Draft would be a supreme exercise in patience for Garry Kasparov. But to excitable 22-year-olds who stand at the threshold of their lifelong dreams, it nearly is torture.

The draft is an excruciatingly long process (the first round alone usually takes about seven hours), made more so because the salary and odds of making a team diminish greatly for each hopeful as the rounds tick past.

In what is becoming an annual affair for K-State's football standouts, their draft hopes are about as tenuous as can be.

The only Wildcat relatively sure of where he'll be selected is K-State's all-time sack leader, defensive end Darren Howard. Howard's flair for the pass rush and ability to just play the game of football has overcome scouts' early concerns

Kansas smokers file suit, might become class action

TOPEKA — Three Kansans who have received Medicaid benefits for smoking-related illnesses have filed a lawsuit seeking part of the state's $1.77-billion settlement with big tobacco companies.

Attorneys representing the three Kansans filed the lawsuit in U.S. District Court in Topeka on Wednesday and are requesting the lawsuit be made a class action.

Such status could open the case to tens of thousands of plaintiffs, with a settlement worth millions, said Thomas Lemon, one of the lawyers.

Another attorney, Harold Houck, said the state got a windfall in its settlement.

"The state did a good job, too good of a job," he said.

Plaintiffs are John Puleo, a disabled worker from Topeka who has a heart condition, a lung condition and pneumonia; Judith Clark, a Johnson County woman who has a lung disorder; and Tammy Thomas, a Johnson County woman with emphysema.

Defendants in the case are Attorney General Carla Stovall, who prosecuted and settled the state's tobacco lawsuit; Janet Schalansky, secretary of the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services, which oversees the state's Medicaid program; and Citibank, which receives, manages and distributes the funds paid to Kansas by the tobacco companies.

Spokeswomen for Stovall and Schalansky said their agencies hadn't received copies of the lawsuit and declined to comment.

Defendants in federal lawsuits have 20 days to respond or to seek an extension to file a response.

The case stems from the state's successful lawsuit against R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co. That lawsuit was filed in Shawnee County District Court in 1996.

The state settled that case and others with tobacco companies in 1998.

Kansas is among 46 states that expect to split $206 billion from the settlement over 25 years.

In the lawsuit against the state, the plaintiffs say federal law requires Kansas to pay Medicaid recipients all money recovered from third parties in excess of money needed to reimburse state and federal Medicaid programs.

"The state has taken no steps to disburse to the plaintiffs any portion of the settlement amount or to inform the plaintiffs of their rights to claim that portion of the settlement monies to which they are legally entitled," the lawsuit states.

Kansas is among 12 states in which Medicaid recipients have filed lawsuits to recover part of the settlement.

FCC to allow state's power to prevent phone slamming

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Determining that the telecommunications industry can't police itself, the Federal Communications Commission decided Thursday to let state regulators enforce rules to stop unscrupulous long-distance phone companies from changing people's service without their permission.

The FCC has been overwhelmed by complaints over the illegal practice called slamming, receiving 80,000 grievance letters in recent years.

"Consumers feel a real sense of violation when they are slammed," FCC Chairman William Kennard said. "American consumers are entitled to have their long-distance carrier of choice respected."

The agency had adopted rules to combat slamming two years ago, but MCI WorldCom challenged the rules in court, saying it wanted the commission to consider an industry plan to address the problem. A judge of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia granted the company's request and issued a stay to suspend the rules that only had been in place a month.

But industry officials apparently never reached a consensus on a third-party administrator to oversee their plan, and the FCC decided that the National Association of Regulatory Utility Commissioners would be more objective and has the resources to do the job.

MCI WorldCom spokeswoman Julie Moore said company officials had not had a chance to review the decision and wouldn't make any decisions regarding future legal action until they do.

"We've always maintained that the investigation and resolution of slamming complaints should require an objective decision maker and standardized rules," Moore said.

NARUC, which represents state regulators, said 35 state regulatory commissions have volunteered to enforce anti-slamming rules and more are expected to do so. The FCC will handle cases where states haven't taken the enforcement role, officials said.

Brownback endorses. Linda Holloway, who was at the center of last year's evolution debate, has picked up the endorsement of Sen. Sam Brownback in her bid for reelection to the state Board of Education.

Brownback said Wednesday that he will declare his support for his fellow Republican. Holloway, of Shawnee, plans to officially kick off her campaign Saturday with a rally in Mission. She said Brownback will attend.

Holloway was chairman of the education board last year. She voted with the majority when the board approved state science testing standards that will de-emphasize the teaching of evolution and increase local control in deciding what is taught about the origin of human beings.

"Linda's an incumbent, and she's an old friend," Brownback told The Hutchinson News. The two campaigned together in 1996, and Brownback said he knew Holloway and her family well.

"I would've backed Linda regardless of that issue," Brownback said of the evolution debate. "Local decision-making's a good approach to take."

Holloway will face Sue Gamble, another Republican, for the board's 2nd District seat.

Gamble, a 13-year veteran of the Shawnee Mission Board of Education and a former president of the Kansas Association of School Boards, said she wanted to re-open the entire evolution debate if she is elected.

Evolution letter. A letter further clarifying the state's new science standards that de-emphasize the teaching of evolution will be sent to all 304 Kansas school districts.

The Kansas Board of Education voted 6-3 Wednesday to distribute to educators an explanation of its efforts to strengthen the standards and clarify what students in Kansas schools should learn.

"Based on the calls and e-mails I've received, the public doesn't understand what the board did," John Bacon, a conservative board member from Olathe, said in proposing the public relations campaign.

The new standards, approved in August, include natural selection, the idea that advantageous traits increase in a population over time.

However, the standards exclude macroevolution, the theory that different species — most notably apes and humans — can have common ancestors.

The standards, which are curriculum guidelines for school districts, also do not mention the age of the earth or the big-bang theory of the universe's origin.

Senate prepares for 2000-01 school year

■ 51 senators needed on committees will be sworn in next Thursday.

By TANNER EHMKE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Student Senate is winding down for the semester under a new term and is in the process of filling committee chairs and making appointments.

Travis Lenkner, newly appointed Senate chair, said Thursday night's meeting was the first normal meeting for the new Senate.

"We're working like mad, making assignments and appointments," Lenkner, junior in mass communications, said.

There are 51 senators required to be on committees. After Lenkner has made the appointments for committee chairs, they will be sworn in at next Thursday's meeting. Because the committees have not yet been decided, Senate does not pass bills.

"There are currently no committees," Lenkner said. "So, the Senate transcends no legislation."

It was a good week for the new senators to experience the Senate meetings, Lenkner said.

The new senators see a meeting before there are any real issues that need to be debated, he said.

During this time of year, there is little business or legislation needing to be passed.

That makes it easier on students and new senators because, academically, it is a busy time for people, Lenkner said.

Before the regular meeting, the new senators went through the first of two Senate orientations to learn the process of how the meetings are run.

They experienced the passing of commendations and one appointment.

Senate passed by unanimous consent the appointment of Shannon Lyles, sophomore in environmental design, to the university wide Academic Honor Council from the College of Architecture, Planning and Design. Lyles was approved to serve the 2000-2002 term on the council.

Senate also made formal commendations for Sarah Glaser, senior in biology, who was awarded the Truman Scholarship; Brandon Grossardt, senior in mathematics, Brian Christopher Keller, senior in microbiology, Stephanie Russell, junior in biology, and Jacob Taussig, junior in biochemistry, who were awarded Goldwater Scholarships; the K-State Debate Team, which placed seventh in the nation; Nick Lander, junior in psychology, who was awarded the Outstanding Undergraduate Student Staff Member award; and Chad Boisseau, Angie Herbers and Nicole Meyer, all seniors in family studies and human services, who won the American Express Financial Planning Invitational in New York City.

KELLY GLASSCOCK/COLLEGIAN

Page and Nancy Twiss were honored Thursday evening with the Lifetime Leadership Award in the K-State Student Union. After receiving the award, both took a moment to answer questions.

Couple's leadership honored by College of Education

By MAGGIE MARTIN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Page and Nancy Twiss combine both collaboration and cooperation, two qualities important to leadership, said Robert Shoop, professor of educational administration and leadership studies.

The couple was awarded the Lifetime Leadership Award on Thursday night at a reception honoring those involved in the Leadership Studies Program, offered through the College of Education.

"This is a celebration of leadership and of some individuals who have made a difference at K-State and in the Manhattan community," Shoop said. "The Twisses have a long history of working individually and together, while supporting each other. They've been active contributors to the community, making it a better place for people to live."

Page Twiss began at K-State in 1959 as an assistant professor of geology. He was promoted to associate professor in 1964 and to full professor in 1969. He served as head of the Department of Geology from 1968 to 1977. He retired in 1995.

Page Twiss served two years as chairman and 10 years as secretary-treasurer of the south-central section of the Geological Society of America.

"We each have duty as a citizen of this country," Page Twiss said. "It is important to continue being active citizens because that is what makes democracy work."

Nancy Twiss came to K-State as a pre-law adviser and in 1980 became the adviser for students seeking national scholarships.

The Twisses both have served on the Council of Human Relations. They also have been members of scholarship committees, themselves donating scholarships, and have participated in political campaigns and sponsored youth activities.

"We believe in citizen power," Nancy Twiss said. "As democracy is passed on, you must continue informing yourself and keep up with what you have learned."

"The American experiment in democracy has continued because ordinary citizens and others keep it going," she said.

Alice Williams, a former advisee of Nancy Twiss' and senior in German, described the couple as humble — not wanting to talk about themselves.

"It takes a rare person to be so active behind the scenes," she said. "They're so loving, caring and kind."

"Nancy has an incredible spirit for advocacy," she said. "She's always talking about being an active citizen in the community."

Susan Scott, associate dean and assistant professor of leadership studies, met the Twisses years ago when she was involved in Faculty Senate.

"They meet our mission statement of developing knowledgeable, ethical and caring leaders for a diverse world," Scott said. "They were role models for so many people years ago and are still role models for others today."

Page Twiss said people should strive constantly to be their best, listen and appreciate others, participate as great team members and have fun.

Collegian commends Senate task force

The Faculty Senate task force's proposal to re-evaluate K-State's Office of Affirmative Action and the outlets open to students to combat intolerable treatment is to be commended.

The task force took a strong stance Tuesday in favor of moving the Affirmative Action office out of Anderson Hall to avoid a common concern by students that they have to report issues regarding faculty and administration to the administration, when that is not the case.

Although the Office of Administration still is reviewing the proposal, the fact that it admits there could be problems with the current system and want to improve it is a positive thing for K-State.

Other recommendations by the task force include a mediation process between the harassed and his or her harasser, a stronger policy on what intolerable treatment actually is, with firm consequences and education of the university community on all services the Affirmative Action office offers.

Part of the education process includes the fact that there is no statute of limitations when dealing with the Affirmative Action office.

Although the Affirmative Action office still is reviewing the recommendations by the task force, the direction in which K-State is heading is the right one.

For K-State to continue to grow as a university, students must be educated and be aware of all the services K-State offers.

Students have the right to know there are places to go and people to talk to when they feel they have been inappropriately treated by either a student or a faculty member.

IFC's deeds exemplify responsible judgement

Editor,

Congratulations to the Interfraternity Council Board of Directors for its wisdom and good judgment in unanimously supporting the Acacia fraternity's petition for readmittance to the IFC family at K-State.

It was unfortunate that student members of Acacia failed to follow IFC rules and regulations last year, and as a result, were severely disciplined following a hearing by the IFC Judicial Council. The president of IFC, along with the other officers, provided strong leadership and made it clear hazing and fraternity misconduct will not be condoned at K-State.

We now need to recognize the fact that responsible members of the Acacia Alumni Association have stepped forward. Along with IFC and K-State officials, they are correcting a serious situation brought forth by an error in judgment by student members of the fraternity.

Acacia alumni members and faculty representatives all need to work together to continue to build and strengthen our outstanding greek system at K-State, supporting the opportunities for student leadership development in a proactive environment. Our greek system might not be perfect in every sense. However, the many strengths and positives generated and gained by its student members and our community far outweigh the negatives displayed in your editorial, "IFC fails to stand up against greek hazing."

On the contrary, IFC, under President Mike Goodpasture's outstanding leadership, has made a strong and credible stand. It recognizes the importance of correcting mistakes within the system by reviewing and enhancing opportunities to strengthen student leadership development programs in K-State's greek system.

The fraternity alumni associations and K-State officials recognize the strong contributions our student IFC officers and members give to the growth and success of our great university. We will continue to seek every opportunity we have for the promotion and success of our student members. We are proud of the accomplishments of our greek system and should not have to apologize for occasional misjudgment by student members, for it is by trial and error that we grow and develop.

The Collegian's Reader Fourum is an anonymous call-in system that allows readers to voice their opinions on any topic for 20 seconds.

Word to the wise: don't use Lafene Health Center. They told me I had heartburn when I actually had allergies.

For the guy who yelled at me while I was running by his apartment: thanks, I needed that.

Greek or geek: what's the difference?

I think we need a box on the K-State white pages that says whether or not someone is available.

It would be nice if the Collegian would print stuff that is happening in the Union — like the reptile exhibit and the skin and ink — before it happens. Not everybody goes to the Union every day.

Rich Smith's article on the draft was right on.

Terminating the student power-plant employees seems like reverse age discrimination. If they were 60 and being replaced by younger workers, there would be trouble.

Symbols deserve protection under 1st Amendment regardless of connotation

We were taught growing up there is no such thing as a stupid question except for the one we do not ask, and that everyone is entitled to his or her own opinion.

Since everything is open to personal interpretation, everything can possess more than one meaning — like the swastika.

To some people, the swastika is a symbol of good luck.

To others, it is a symbol of religious faith and one of the many variations of the Greek cross.

In the past century, however, the swastika has developed a new meaning due to its unfortunate association with Nazism, fascism and anti-Semitism. The swastika forever will be remembered as the symbol of Hitler's Third Reich, the Holocaust and genocide. More recently, the Neo-Nazis, skinheads and members of the Ku Klux Klan have begun to use the swastika as a symbol of their causes — white supremacy and racial hatred.

Due to all the negative connotations now associated with this once-sacred symbol, the German government has placed so many restrictions upon the use of the swastika that it basically has been banned within Germany.

So, if a particular individual chooses to adorn himself with swastikas, does that necessarily imply he or she is a white supremacist?

Of course not. Even if he or she is, the First Amendment protects the right to believe whatever they want and to wear anything they wish.

Likewise, the Confederate battle flag also possesses more than one meaning and soon might suffer the same fate as the swastika. To some, the Confederate flag simply is a symbol of Southern pride and heritage.

To others, it is a racist symbol that conjures images of slavery, lynchings, oppression and bigotry.

This division has resulted in a debate whose meaning is more appropriate for today and whether the Confederate flag should be flown or displayed in association with any government building — such as the South Carolina capitol building — if at all.

Many people believe the Civil War was fought entirely over the issue of slavery, and therefore the Confederate flag is — and always has been — a racist symbol. As a result, many people are offended by the flying of this symbol, which tends to recall the forced passage to America and enslavement of thousands of Africans. Using this medieval thought process, anything that we disagreed on therefore somehow should be restricted, if not eliminated.

Therefore, we soon would be living in a world with so little freedom that if we even breathe the wrong way we might find ourselves with an iron lung.

The Confederate flag, like the swastika, merely is a symbol. As such, it only represents something in the mind of the beholder. It is not, of itself, good, bad or indifferent.

With that in mind, should the United States allow "Old Glory" to be burned? Absolutely.

The fact that our nation allows flag desecration is one of the things that makes this nation so great and should be considered a sign of our national strength.

After all, the flag is just a symbol. It is the Constitution that is the embodiment of our heritage, the flag legally provides nothing.

Besides, the symbol of a country cannot just be a flag; the symbol also must be one of its citizens exercising their right to burn that flag in protest.

I realize that burning an American flag might be offensive to many.

However, flag desecration — like the use of the swastika or the Confederate flag — is a form of free speech and protected by the First Amendment.

It is time for people to stop whining and realize that the point of the First Amendment is not to protect speech with which we agree, but speech that we despise.

Take Back the Night march deserves more respect from Fourum callers

VIEWPOINT

ERIN SCHNEWEIS

There is a real problem with the Campus Fourum.

Granted, it can be entertaining to read, even though the majority of the comments are negative. It is interesting to find out what students around campus are thinking about issues. These issues have a broad scope, since they range from parking to the never-ending independent-vs.-greek debate.

With the Fourum, there rarely is any sugar coating. Candidness is, and forever will be, an admirable trait.

Yet the question arises, how candid can people actually be when their comments are anonymous?

The words used might be powerful, but what strength and passion do they convey when people don't have the courage to use their names?

In Tuesday's Collegian, a caller shared a negative view on something of which K-State students should be proud.

The caller said, "K-State women want to take back the night. On a more serious note, I need to take back my movie rentals so I don't get a late fee."

This is a comment that denotes sheer immaturity. Comments such as this only should be taken with a grain of salt. Usually, that is how I take everything in the Fourum: as a joke.

Yet this time I refuse to let a statement like this take away the strength that those involved with Take Back the Night represented one week ago.

The march was for women who had been molested, raped or abused to stand strong in front of their peers, friends and the city of Manhattan to see. It also was for women who had not gone through any of the ordeals, to show their support to those who had. Men were there to lend emotional support and to prove that not every guy does harmful things.

It was not a man-hating event. It was an issue of courage to speak out, to stand up from painful experiences. Those women did. Thus, they deserve an enormous amount of respect.

In my sociology class, one woman said she participated in the event.

She later was asked why she had been in the "dyke march." This march had nothing to do with lesbian rights. But it had everything to do with the rights of women.

For those women whose lives never will be the same, the march was an act of courage, an act that should be applauded candidly, not shunned anonymously.

The strength of those 300 women who were present should not — and cannot — be shaken by a caller to the Fourum. Yet it is unfair to bypass such remarks when so many women took a strong stand on an important issue that, unfortunately, hit too close to home.

As a columnist, even as a person, the first lesson one must learn is that everyone is entitled to, and should have, an opinion.

To the caller who is more preoccupied with late video rentals, I fail to see the humor, and only can see the immaturity behind the words. To take an issue that is so personal and poke fun at it does not make you humorous. Perhaps next time you care to share such a lighthearted approach, you should have the nerve to write a letter to the editor and sign your name.

To the women who supported Take Back the Night: I applaud you for your strength and courage. I hope this is taken with more than a grain of salt.

For you have a picture and a name to go with this opinion.

Psychology professor examines challenges facing black males

MICHAEL YOUNG/COLLEGIAN

Joseph White delivers a speech in the K-State Student Union's Little Theatre on Thursday evening. He covered four psychological problems he said hamper the emergence of black males.

By DANICA COTO
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

He must be black.
After all, he wears those baggy pants, plays that rap music and works as a comedian on the week-end. But that's not the problem — the problem are people who believe he must be black.
"You will never understand the black male fully from just these stereotypes," said Joseph White, a retired professor of psychology and comparative literature from the University of California-Irvine. "I have 130 years hands-on experience with the black males. There is another story."
White talked Thursday night about the psychological challenges the black male faces.
He said America focuses on the stereotypes of black males: those who fail to pay child support, those who disrespect women, those who carry around AK-47s. But what about those black males who work at airports, work as mailmen and pay child support, White asked.

"America doesn't see that," he said. "And that's the story I want to tell."
The story White told transcended the life of a black male from birth to old age. The first issue he addressed was how every young black man has a need for a dream and human closeness. Respect is an essential part of the dream but is something that is hard to obtain in America, he said.
"Can they achieve that dream in a country who has a history of oppression?" White said.
However, he said the obstacles that come with this dream can be fought by men who have four satisfying types of relationships. The first is the extended family, the second their male peers, then the romantic relationship and finally the mentor.
The problem is that black men are lacking a relationship with a mentor, he said.

"It's the missing piece today," he said.
Black men also have another struggle: that of racism.
White talked about Texaco's 1,400 employees and how not a single one was black, and there was not "one iota of racism" in their company. He said the company wrote out a check for millions because someone had leaked a tape to CNN where top CEOs were talking and acting racist.
Then he explained how Danny Glover catches a taxi in New York: he promises an old lady his autograph if she's able to flag down a taxi for him.
He said there's also a more recent show of racism: how Amadou Diallo got shot 41 times when he was pulling out his wallet to show his ID. Racist people continue to be a problem, but White focused on solutions concerning fatherhood and manhood.

"We need to work with them and teach them very simple things," he said.
These things include how to get a job, how to respect women and how to communicate with an ex-wife and one's child, he said.
White came to speak at K-State because Michael Holen, dean of education, said he thought the topic would appeal to a wide range of individuals.
"He has a reputation for stimulating audiences to think deeply about those issues," he said. "He's a good combination of a scholar and a practical seeker of solutions."
White said he had thought about being a marriage counselor, and although he didn't pursue this goal, he applied what he learned to the struggle between blacks and whites.
Both need to communicate and find common ground, he said.

5-time 'Jeopardy!' champion teaches students memorization skills, tips on test-taking

By JENNIFER RYAN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

With finals fast approaching, students can use all the help they can get to memorize information quickly.
Union Program Council offered a solution to the chaos Thursday night with the lecture "Learning Skills 101: How to ace all your tests without even trying," by Bob Harris. Harris is a comedian, researcher, radio personality, author, activist and five-time "Jeopardy!" game-show winner.
Harris said memories are more strongly attached to primal instincts such as sex or danger.
"If it's something that causes a threat or stress, you will remember it — we're just wired that way. Your mind doesn't recognize that chemical equation as a life or death issue, so you don't remember it as easily," he said. "You have to take that new info and glue it to old information using provocative images or memories."

Harris said prior to memorization techniques, exercise and nutrition are fundamentals of learning knowledge.
"Your brain uses more oxygen than anything else in your body," he said. "Eat right. Smoking kills brain cells — you are inhaling carbon monoxide and making yourself stupid. These are huge factors in intelligence."
Harris also said routines are important to test-taking abilities.
"The most important phenomenon in your mind is state-dependent retrieval," he said. "The environment you learned the information in is congruent to how it was when you memorized it. Study as much as you can in the normal exam environment."

To help state-dependent retrieval, Harris said he recommends scheduling an organized review time each week to review details of class notes.
"Organized review should be 50 percent of your time," he said. "There is a decay in the way in which your memory works."
To calm down during an exam, Harris said anchoring a physical motion to a relaxed mental state is one of the most important tricks to recalling information.

"Pick something you've never done before in your life so it won't be connected with other memories. Get some quiet time and go inside yourself. Pick a day or moment you remember and try to invoke every sense you felt. It takes time to iron it in, but when you're in a stressful situation — fire off the physical anchor, and your body involuntarily begins assuming what you taught it."
Free association is another way the mind can access information quickly, Harris said.

"Every single thought in your head is connected," he said. "Your thought process is not linear — it's spherical. This is the essence of creativity."
"This stuff was not in my major," Harris said after showing a clip of his time on "Jeopardy!" "Everything I learned, I learned in the three weeks before the show."
"Anybody can do this. I was a 3.0 student. I was a good, solid 'B' student, and I always felt that I was smarter than my grades showed. This is stuff they don't teach you in school — how to learn," he said. "They hand you a book and tell you what you need to know, and don't tell you how to know it. You go home and you pray you have a sticky brain that night."

Michael Reinhold, junior in chemical engineering, said most of the techniques were useful.
"I'm going to go home and think about this, but parts of it I probably won't use," Reinhold said. "It's easy enough to memorize certain things with these skills, but not useful for technical and applied skills."
Dawn Dechand, junior in biological and agricultural engineering, said she would use some of the skills.
"Some of them are common sense, and you just needed to be reminded, and other ideas seem original and worth a try," she said.

Solid pitching backs up Cats

By MIKE VIETTI
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The transformation of the K-State pitching staff from the beginning of the season to its current status 32 games into the year can best be described by a slightly altered "Amazing Grace" lyric: What once was lost, now is found.

K-State will look to continue its recent trend of solid pitching against Howard this weekend in a three game series starting at 4:30 p.m. today at Frank Myers Field.

Nine games into the 2000 season, K-State's (12-20, 3-14) team ERA stood at an alarming 11.59 — still drastically high in the juiced-up, aluminum-bat world of college baseball. Since then, the team ERA has dropped steadily to where it now stands at 7.68.

"We've made a nice, significant move, but we're still walking too many people," head coach Mike Clark said.

The statistics still point to a well-rounded improvement from each of the staff's primary contributors.

Sophomore starter Chad Duckers' (3-3) ERA has dropped every time he has made an appearance — from 27.00 after giving up three runs to Washington State in one inning Feb. 5 to 6.87 after the Oklahoma State series last weekend.

Freshman reliever Todd Lundwall's (1-2) ERA was 7.84 after pitching in the Cats 7-1 Feb. 23 loss to Creighton but has fallen by almost a run per nine innings to 6.88.

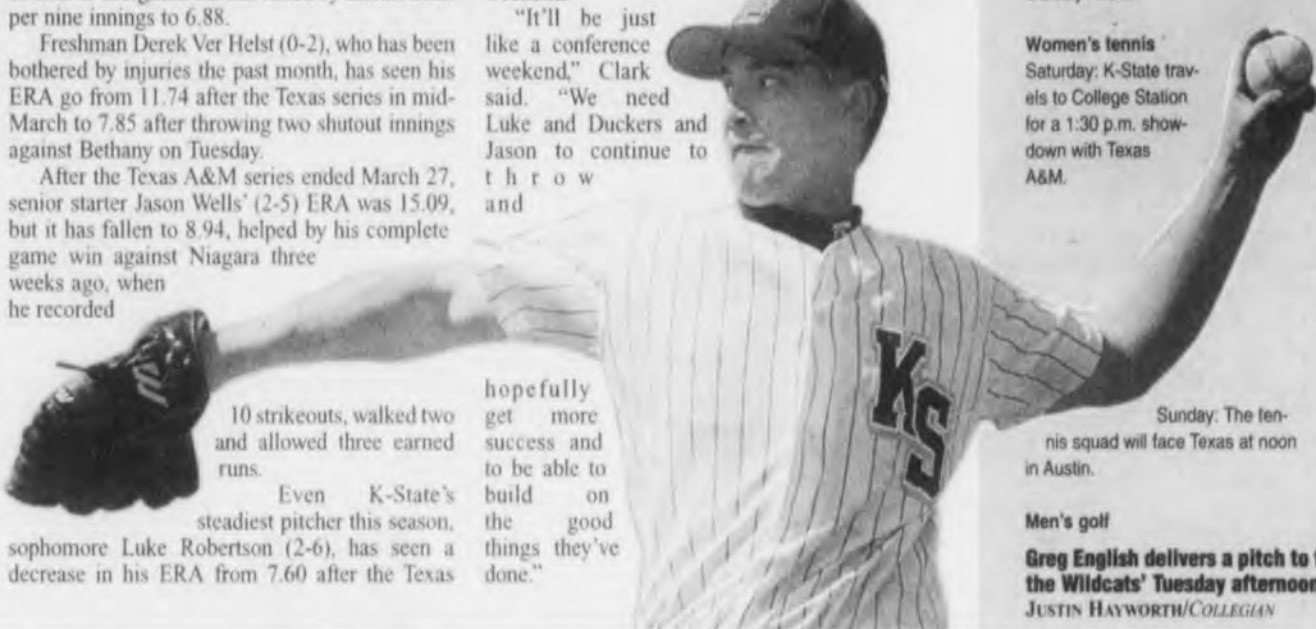

Freshman Derek Ver Helst (0-2), who has been bothered by injuries the past month, has seen his ERA go from 11.74 after the Texas series in mid-March to 7.85 after throwing two shutout innings against Bethany on Tuesday.

After the Texas A&M series ended March 27, senior starter Jason Wells' (2-5) ERA was 15.09, but it has fallen to 8.94, helped by his complete game win against Niagara three weeks ago, when he recorded series to 6.02.

Even though the Wildcats will be taking on a smaller Division I school in Howard, Clark said Duckers, Robertson and Wells each will start this weekend.

"It'll be just like a conference weekend," Clark said. "We need Luke and Duckers and Jason to continue to throw and 10 strikeouts, walked two and allowed three earned runs.

Even K-State's steadiest pitcher this season, sophomore Luke Robertson (2-6), has seen a decrease in his ERA from 7.60 after the Texas hopefully get more success and to be able to build on the good things they've done."

Junior college All-American signs K-State basketball letter of intent

K-State head basketball coach Jim Wooldridge announced Thursday that Larry Reid had signed a national letter of intent to play for the Wildcats next season.

Reid, a 6-foot tall point guard, spent his previous two years at Northern Oklahoma Junior College, where he averaged 18.5 points, six assists and three steals.

The Midwest City, Okla., native also was named a Junior College All-American, and as a sophomore led his team to the National Junior College Tournament.

Adding to his resume, Reid also was named MVP of the Region II Tournament.

"The bottom line is that Larry has proven that he is a winner," Wooldridge said. "He has led both his high school and junior college teams to the highest levels of success. He has been well coached throughout his career which will help him make the transition to Division I basketball."

Reid joins E.J. Harris, a 6-foot-3-inch guard from Crenshaw High School in Los Angeles, and Jason Robinson, a 6-foot 6-inches guard/forward from Seward County Community College.

K-State site for international match

K-State will be host to an exhibition match between the U.S. Men's National Volleyball Team and the Australian National Team on May 12 at Ahearn Field House.

The match is part of a four-city tour by the two national teams that also will include the University of Southern Colorado, Mesa State University and the University of Kansas. The U.S. team, which has qualified for the 2000 Summer Olympics in Sydney, Australia, is ranked fifth in the latest world rankings.

Tickets will go on sale Monday at the K-State Athletic Ticket Office in Bramlage Coliseum. Adult tickets are $5, and student, children and senior citizen tickets are $3. Tickets also can be purchased through the KSU Ticket Office at (800) 221-CATS.

Athletes recognized for academics

K-State's outstanding student athletes were honored Wednesday evening.

All student athletes who had achieved a 3.0 grade point average or higher were honored, but several specific awards were given for service and academic work above and beyond what is expected.

The Bog and Lila Snell Award for Excellence and Effort, given to the outstanding male and female student athletes of the year, was awarded to sophomore defensive tackle Eric Everley and junior tennis player Anna Pampoulova.

These two athletes were honored for their tremendous academic effort, said Phil Hughes, associate director of the athletic academic center.

"They were awarded for their effort and tenacity that has led to academic success," Hughes said.

The Big 12 Conference Service Awards were given to senior men's basketball player Josh Reid and senior crew member Paula Schneider. Both athletes were recognized for their efforts in community service, Hughes said.

Josh was president of the Student Athlete Advisory Committee and was instrumental in adopting and implementing a number of significant service initiatives," Hughes said. "The entire rowing team is very active with service projects like Rowing For Humanity. Paula also helped begin the Read and Achieve program, where student athletes read to students at Theodore Roosevelt Elementary School."

In addition to being this year's SAAC president, Reid also was active in a number of service projects, including Cats for Cans, All-University Open House, career development activities and a community reading program.

The final award given was the Distinguished Service Award, given annually to a member of SAAC. This year's winner was senior women's basketball player Jenny Coalson, who is a four-year member of SAAC and was the committee's president last year.

the importance of Communication

BY DEREK BOSS

Doubles partners help each other improve, adjust to American tennis

Komunikace.

Junior Eva Novotna and freshman Petra Sedlmajerova rely on it every day, especially when they form a versatile duo on the doubles court.

In Czech, the word means "communication."

"We communicate in Czech," Novotna said. "It's an advantage that way when you're actually down at the net or on the baseline. It makes it easier for us to talk to each other on the court."

With both athletes coming from the Czech Republic, Sedlmajerova said it's only natural for them to speak to each other in their native tongue.

It's paid off, as K-State's No. 1 doubles tandem has made significant progress over the course of the season.

"I think we've come a long way since the beginning," Novotna said. "It just takes time for you to play better and get used to each other on the court. How we're playing right now doesn't even compare to last semester."

During the fall, both women struggled to find their groove in the doubles venue, especially Sedlmajerova.

"It helps that I've been around for three years now," Novotna said. "I help Petra when things aren't going too well, especially first semester when she just got here."

Being a freshman, Sedlmajerova never really had focused on doubles play before, as European tennis places its emphasis on singles competition.

"Petra could jump in at singles at this level and have quite a bit of success right away, but in doubles, there was no way she could have that kind of success," K-State head coach Steve Bietau said.

"The level of attention given to doubles is so low. Most players are taught to be more wary of their singles ranking, while doubles is more of an afterthought. It's common for them to come to college and not have a good understanding, so "The tournament told us how far we had to go to get our doubles to the level we would like to have them, which means if we're tied 3-3 after singles — we can count on winning the match."

"We've had a couple of matches really close, and we've been able to pull them out. We've had a lot of the progress during that time, but most of the progress has been made by this team," he said of

"It's more of a personality kind of thing — how they fit together and relate to each other when they play.

It's an intangible thing that's not easy to measure."

— Steve Bietau tennis head coach

it's a much bigger jump for them than it is in singles."

Consequently, Bietau said he elects to have a fall tournament specifically for doubles to get his players accustomed to the level of collegiate tennis, especially considering all seven of his athletes are from overseas.

He said this year's Oct. 30-31 Wildcat Doubles Invitational at the Washburn Tennis Complex spoke loud and clearly.

"I remember a couple of conversations with (assistant coach) Dinah (Watson) about how much work we had to do with our doubles," Bietau said.

his No. 1 pair.

Sedlmajerova said it's much easier to make doubles progress in the United States, since Europe tends to have no consistency in doubles pairings.

"I've improved in doubles a lot," she said. "We never practiced it back home — it was mainly all singles matches. In tournaments, I didn't play doubles so often, and when I did, everyone was with a different partner."

This spring, the tandem of Sedlmajerova and Novotna has had a chance to work together all semester and build chemistry on the court.

Football receiving corps needs of worthy nickname

Contests always seem to go the best with relatively nothing to do.

Think about it. When the local sports franchise is stuck in the bowels of its respective division, the team's marketing division always works harder to crank out some reason for fans to invest a couple of hours at the game. Such revolutionary contests/promotions as the infamous mascot game that seems to precede K-State basketball's Fright Night every year and "Charles Barkley Haircut Night" come from this type of situation.

Which brings us to the present, i.e. my column. There's a certain lack of topics to be examined this particular week. The NFL Draft? Already been handled. Stanley Cup playoffs? As much as I enjoy them, I don't think many others would be interested in how the Pavel Bure/Anna Kournikova relationship will hinder the Florida Panthers' shot at the title. Jack Gardner already has been honored by others far more knowledgeable of the man's career. Basically, all prevalent sports events for the week of April 14, 2000, have been covered in some way or another.

So, it's best to use this week's space as a proposition of sorts. A proposition of naming K-State's talented receiving corps.

This is nothing new. The media often has been used or abused to cultivate a nickname that best suits an athlete or group within the team. But there's been a bit of a dry spell in this field recently. It's time to revive this tradition, and the Wildcat wideouts are the best place to begin.

What I'm proposing is this: any fan or curious party interested in injecting their two cents on a fitting title for the corps is welcome to e-mail me your suggestion. All ideas will be gathered until Wednesday, when the Collegian sports staff will decide which entry is the best based on creativity, originality and taste (this is a family publication, after all). The winner will be noted in next Friday's column and will be rewarded with a copy of the 1999 K-State football highlight video.

Playing for pride is one thing, but we all know the gears of creativity crank a little faster with some tangible incentive.

Now that the terms of engagement are out of the way, an explanation for why the receiving corps was chosen for this contest is necessary. The K-State football program has generated an unbelievable amount of interest across the entire state, let alone the campus. Fans already are treating the spring game like the return of "Shaft," minus the mutton chops and Isaac Hayes score. The scent of barbecue babyback ribs wafting from a tailgate party isn't too far off.

With this mounting anticipation, fans need a name to identify with their Wagner Field warriors. The defense already has been covered. "The Mob" isn't going away, regardless of arguments to the contrary. Freshman phenom Eli Roberson seems to have cemented his own tag with recent weather events. Even without game experience, "Eli Niño" is catching on.

It's time to pick something for the receivers. The position is loaded once again this season.

Aaron Lockett should continue his slippery work in the defense's secondary. All-Big 12 selection Quincy Morgan could break more single-season marks in 2000. Martez Wesley and Brandon Clark, who should rebound from another injury, also are dangerous weapons in the fold.

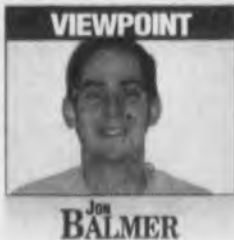

Even defensive back Terence Newman might get some reps on the offensive side. All in all, the receiving corps should provide plenty of excitement.

So, where's the nickname this group so greatly deserves? The Denver Broncos used to thrive on "The Three Amigos," John Elway's favorite targets. The University of Florida's receivers don't have a title, but who needs one when you play in the "Fun 'N Gun"? It's time to do our part as Wildcat fans.

This might turn out to be nothing more than a temporary title. Certain proposals of this ilk (deciding on a hand signal to represent K-State) have failed in the past. But the possibility to create something that lasts is there. Someday you might be able to brag about how you suggested the name that remains with K-State's receivers to this day.

Besides, the possibility of snagging a free highlight video should be enough for Wildcat fans eagerly anticipating the return of Saturday afternoons at the purple horseshoe.

Women's crew team tries for Kansas Cup

By DEREK BOSS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State crew squad will look to avenge its 17-9 loss to Kansas last fall as it travels to Lawrence this Saturday for the fourth-annual Kansas Cup.

K-State head coach Jenny Hale said she expects a difficult challenge for the Wildcats this weekend.

"KU is running very fast right now, and we must have good races this weekend to beat them," Hale said. "We must take lessons from our past races and turn out some good strokes."

Such races include a trip to the Davis, Calif., tri-dual last weekend.

As an entire team, Hale said K-State's venture to the West Coast was a valuable one, despite the team's limited success.

"We were in some tight races, and I think we've gained a great deal of experience," Hale said. "And being so young, that's definitely what we need against a team like KU."

Hale said the Jayhawks will have a definitive advantage with such a veteran varsity squad.

"At the varsity level, they're a very strong team right now," Hale said. "Anytime you can get all your top rowers back, you're going to have a very strong boat. So, we're going to have our hands full."

In fact, the Kansas Cup very well could come down to the 10:45 a.m. First Varsity Eight race, Hale said, as has been the precedent in previous years of the regatta.

"The bottom line is to get off the line fast and quick, because if we don't, they're too strong a team for us to catch up to," Hale said.

However, the Cats' coach said to watch for K-State's novice squads to provide a spark against the Hawks. Before losing to Cal-Davis last Sunday, the Cats' First Novice Eight boat had compiled a perfect 8-0 record.

"At the freshman level, it should be a very close race," Hale said. "They're doing very well right now, and they've been in several tight races. If they get in that situation again, I think they'll have the experience to see it through."

Hale said the crew squad has been motivated all week for Saturday's event.

"It's not hard to get a K-State team up for KU," she said.

K-State leads Kansas 2-1 in the series history of the Kansas Cup, but the Hawks claimed the most recent edition with a 12-8 victory on April 18, 1999.

Saturday's regatta will begin at 10:15 a.m. on Clinton Lake in Lawrence.

Gay Pride Month celebrates acceptance

By KELLY EVENSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The history and contributions of various minority groups are recognized annually. However, another segment of the population is seeking recognition — homosexuals.

Heath Harding, secretary for the Queer Straight Alliance, said Gay Pride Month is meant to celebrate the acceptance of sexuality. "This is just like having a Black History or Asian-American History month," Harding said. "There have been a lot of gay people in history, and it has been left out or simply not talked about. This is a way to highlight gay people who have been a part of our history throughout the ages."

Harding said Gay Pride Month is celebrated nationally and internationally in June. However, because there are not a lot of students or faculty on campus during the summer, many colleges and universities throughout the United States choose to designate the month of April or a week in April.

There are five activities to celebrate Gay Pride Month at K-State — four movies and one diversity dialogue.

The first of the movies, which was shown April 5, was "Assault on Gay America."

Harding said it was about the murder of Billy Jack Gaither, a man who was murdered by two men for being gay.

It also highlighted a study about what causes homophobia in men.

The second movie, "It's Elementary," was Thursday night and involved discussion about gay topics in elementary classrooms. Harding said this movie is important to those students who are studying elementary education because of the topics and discussions that might surface as gay issues become more prevalent in the classroom.

"This movie will highlight some ways to talk about gay issues to young children," Harding said. "Some parents are afraid of these issues to be talked about because they are afraid sex will be involved. However, this is an important and good show for all educators."

The third movie, "Transgendered Revolution," is at 7 p.m. Tuesday in Union 206. Harding said this movie will be timely because of the recent release of the movie, "Boys Don't Cry," which dealt with Brandon Teena, a born female who felt she was meant to live her life as a man and then was murdered for the actions that followed.

The last of the movies, "If These Walls Could Talk 2," will be at 7 p.m. April 24 in Union 209. This movie depicts the lives of lesbians in the 1960s, '70s and '90s, and it deals with topics such as lesbians, their partners and death.

Karrie Mitchell, president of QSA, said Gay Pride Month is important because it increases the visibility of homosexuals on campus and in Manhattan.

"Visibility is important to me because a lot of people do not realize that there are gay people in Kansas or even at K-State," Mitchell said. "The fact that we are able to put on something like Gay Pride Month helps us create more awareness."

Harding said the last presentation during Gay Pride Month is a diversity dialogue at 4 p.m. April 27 in the Hemisphere Room in Hale Library. It will be sponsored by Hale and Multicultural Affairs.

The dialogue will touch on diversity issues concerning gays and lesbians.

Christina Hauck, faculty adviser for QSA and assistant professor of English, said she thinks Gay Pride Month is important and essential for the campus and the community because of the fear and shame surrounding homosexuality.

"Many people in our culture, country, Kansas, Manhattan and the campus sincerely believe that there is something wrong with being homosexual — they feel it is a crime," Hauck said. "This is the beliefs that our children are taught, and they sense it is something bad early on."

Hauck said Gay Pride Month is a way to wake people up and teach those who might be against the month that those who identify themselves as gay still can live happy lives. "Those that are frightened will turn against Gay Pride Month," Hauck said. "They will call it a recruitment tool, but maybe it will help them understand more about those that are gay. I hope everyone will have fun and learn through the events."

Zoo site of Earth Day fair

By JASON BECK
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Sunset Zoological Park will have its annual Environmental Fair and Human Health Expo for Earth Day on Saturday.

"We want people to find out how they can help save this planet," said Eileen Bauer, marketing development director for Sunset Zoo.

Bauer said about 2,000 people are expected to show up at the fair, which will run from 10 a.m. to 5 p.m.

Bauer said the fair will consist of booths displayed by environmentally conscious groups. Some of the organizations at the fair will include Big Brothers and Big Sisters of Manhattan Inc., the Student Agricultural Senate and the Wal-Mart Green Team.

"The Green Team is a division of Wal-Mart that helps communities that have Wal-Mart's how to recycle and how to re-use different things," Bauer said.

Bauer said other groups will be present, including the Humane Society, the Kansas Department of Wildlife and Parks and even some student organizations from K-State.

The Students for Environmental Actions is a group of about 25 students that will have a booth at the fair, said Amy Dix, junior in biochemistry and one of the founders of the group.

Dix said their group is the reincarnation of a previous student organization that went into hibernation. Dix resurrected the group this spring, and said they have been revamped, with a mailing list, Web site and new activities.

"One of our booths will be a demonstration of soil and water quality for kids," Dix said.

Dix said kids will get to plant seeds that have been donated by Waters TrueValue Hardware, and they will put them into biodegradable pots. Dix said SEA's other booth will be on recycling and informing families of things that they can recycle.

Schanee Anderson, curator of education for Sunset Zoo, said the purpose of the day is to get people informed.

"We will have tables in the pavilion where people can teach visitors about their organizations," Anderson said.

Anderson also said the zoo's Chimpazoo organization, which studies animal behavior, also will make an appearance.

The admission to the fair is regular zoo fare, $3 for adults and $1.50 for children between the ages of 5 and 12.

'Riverdance' fiddler to perform Saturday at McCain

Fiddler Eileen Ivers of "Riverdance" fame will be performing Saturday night at McCain Auditorium.

"She is a very neat, neat kind of person," said Thom Jackson, marketing development officer at McCain. "It's going to be a very exciting show."

Ivers began playing the fiddle when she was 8 years old. She said her parents both were from Ireland and moved to New York in the 1950s, but they wanted their children to stay connected to their Irish roots.

See Eileen Ivers at 8 p.m. Saturday in McCain Auditorium.
Tickets: $25 and $21 for general public
$23 and $19 for 65 years +
$12.50 and $10.50 for K-State students and under 18

"Mom started me in dancing, but that lasted all of two weeks," Ivers said. "I always loved the fiddle, so I begged her to let me play the fiddle."

Those lessons began a career that has won her more than 30 medals, produced four albums, made her the star fiddler for "Riverdance" and gave her many opportunities to work with several diverse artists and ensembles. She has made appearances on 60 contemporary and traditional albums, including "Back to the Titanic," and has worked with artists such as Paula Cole and the Boston Pops Orchestra.

The Saturday-night show will be music from her own albums. She said most of the music will be from her most recent album, "Crossing the Bridge." This album features Ivers and many other musicians from other ethnic backgrounds.

"It's a very multiculturalistic type of band," Ivers said, "but the music is largely based in Irish traditional music."

Ivers said the members of the band are from all over the world.

"I kind of knew these guys from before," Ivers said. "After 'Crossing the Bridge' came out, I just kind of hand-picked them. When we sat down and started playing, it just worked really well."

The band includes a bassist from Africa, a guitarist from Ireland, a percussionist from Puerto Rico and an accordion player from New York.

"It's going to be a fantastic show," Jim McKay, Ivers' tour agent, said.

"She likes to push the envelope. Irish music is very strict. You play this and nothing else — she has gone way beyond that."

Fiddle music is not the only entertainment for the show. The group also has a vocalist from New York, and one of the tap dancers from "Riverdance" also will be performing.

"There is also a very accomplished Irish dancer performing with them," Jackson said, "who dances on the walls — literally." McKay said a large, plywood wall with a rubber base will be set up so the dancer can dance literally on the wall.

"It's a very, very lively show," McKay said. The show will begin at 8 p.m. Saturday at McCain. Tickets are $25 and $21 for the general public, $23 and $19 for people 65 years of age and older and $12.50 and $10.50 for K-State students and children 18 years of age and younger.

"We're looking forward to it," Ivers said. "Everyone treated us so well when we were there last year. It's going to be a lot of fun."

$1,500 top prize for Fort Riley band competition

By CHRISTIE VANOVER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

Fort Riley is awarding the area's best bands a total of $2,500 at its open house on May 6.

The post will be host to the free event filled with live music and hands-on military attractions to introduce the public to what the U.S. Army and Fort Riley do for the nation, community and its citizens.

As many as 30,000 people are expected to attend, which will give bands more exposure and a broader audience agewise, said Joey Eck, Fort Riley public affairs intern.

Eck and Jay Gooldy, commercial sponsorship and advertising specialist, will choose the top-seven bands that will perform May 6 based on submitted tapes.

"It's an open competition," Gooldy said. "Anyone can apply."

Bands must consist of at least three members and play their own instruments. No karaoke will be accepted.

"I look initially at how professionally the tape is put together," Eck said. "Obviously, I listen to how good their voices are and their sound in general."

Gooldy said he looks for who has the best instrumentation and vocals.

"We want something different people will be interested in," Eck said.

Because the open house is geared toward families, Eck and Gooldy also will be looking for lyrics appropriate for a family environment.

After the top seven bands are selected, they will attend a mandatory meeting to go over rules and judging criteria, Gooldy said.

On May 6, each band will be given 15 minutes to set up and 30 minutes to play, starting at 11 a.m.

Three soldiers and two community members will judge them on a 10-point system in the following categories: musicianship, lead and backup vocals, stage show and professionalism, musical selection, and crowd response.

The first-place band will take home $1,500; second place, $750; and third, $250. Eck said she thinks it is a great opportunity for both college students and soldiers to learn about each other.

"I don't think Fort Riley sees or hears the local music scene," she said. "Since most local bands are made up of college students, they can become more aware of how Fort Riley works, and that it is here to protect us."

The competition will run from 11 a.m. to 4 p.m., coinciding with the remainder of the displays, demonstrations and hands-on exhibits. Exhibits will include a night-vision maze, live tank battle, parachutists, M-16 assault course and K9 demonstrations.

"We have designed the day's activities to be both informative and entertaining," Maj. Art DeGroat, open house project officer, said. "We will showcase the vast amount of military technologies and capabilities resident at Fort Riley, as well as the support systems that make Fort Riley a healthy, vibrant place to live, work and play."

To enter, bands must submit an audition tape featuring a couple of their top selections to DCA Marketing, 253 Stuart Avenue Room 9, Fort Riley, KS 66442, by April 21.

WHAT BANDS CAN PLAY

Bands must have three members who play their own instruments.

To enter, send an audition tape featuring a couple of top selections to:
DCA Marketing
253 Stuart Ave.
Fort Riley, KS 66442.

Entries must be received by April 21.

If selected, bands will perform May 6 at the Fort Riley Open House. Each band will have 15 minutes to set up and 30 minutes to play.

Prizes:
$1,500 first place
$750 second place
$250 third place

Gonzalez's departure delayed for 3 to 4 days by 11th Circuit Court

By ALEX VEIGA
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

MIAMI — Elian Gonzalez's great-uncle defied the government Thursday and the government blinked, letting its deadline to collect the boy pass and agreeing to a delay that averts a law-enforcement showdown for now. In Little Havana, thousands cheered wildly at the news.

Attorneys for Elian's Miami relatives claimed victory after a federal appeals court issued a stay blocking anyone from taking the boy out of the country. The Justice Department, though, said it had agreed to a delay of three or four days.

The 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals told the government to respond to the stay by 9:30 a.m.

today, giving great-uncle Lazaro Gonzalez's family another day with Elian at the very least. Lazaro feels relief, family spokesman Armando Gutierrez said, "at least until tomorrow morning."

Thursday's court action capped a fluid, electrifying day that began minutes after Lazaro Gonzalez dared the government to take Elian by force. In less than 24 hours, the Miami relatives met with Attorney General Janet Reno, publicly announced their defiance of her, allowed Elian to speak on TV and ignored a 2 p.m. deadline to deliver him to an airport for return to his father.

Since January, Reno and the government repeatedly have extended the deadline for Lazaro Gonzalez to surrender the boy despite a standing order to do so. And this week, the nation's top law officer took the extraordinary step of flying down herself in a chartered plane to hammer out a settlement.

Attorneys for Elian's father, Juan Miguel Gonzalez, said the Miami relatives had, with their actions Thursday, "emotionally damaged and exploited this most wonderful little boy."

"Today, Lazaro Gonzalez defied the nation's chief law-enforcement officers and publicly and belligerently refused to turn Elian over to his father," said Gregory Craig, Juan Miguel Gonzalez's attorney. "Today, Lazaro Gonzalez broke the law."

Outside Lazaro Gonzalez's house in Little Havana, a throng several thousand strong massed to protest and, though it would prove unnecessary, protect. "War! War! War!" some shouted in Spanish. Others renewed pledges of nonviolence.

"While this child remains in this house, there is hope," Miami-Dade Mayor Alex Penelas said. "We are living very tense moments, perhaps the most tense in the last 25 years."

After the stay was announced, the crowd jubilantly cried "Victory!" Salsa music pumped through the neighborhood into the night as cars clogged 20 blocks of city streets, horns honking.

"A second miracle is happening in the case of Elian," said Raul Gonzalez, a 72-year-old accountant who lives in the neighborhood. "It seems that God is guiding us."

The stay issued by the 11th Circuit does not specifically prevent the government from transferring Elian to his father. A Justice official, requesting anonymity, said the government gave its word that it wouldn't. The stay was issued while the 11th Circuit decides whether to hear a full appeal of the relatives' claims.

Earlier Thursday, Reno, who roundly was criticized for how the government responded to the Branch Davidians in 1993, said her department would act in a reasonable, measured way.

"We have the authority to take action," Reno said. "But responsible authority means not only knowing when to take action, but how and when to take that action."

After failing to reach an agreement with the family Wednesday during a dramatic 2 1/2-hour meeting attended by Elian, Reno ordered them to bring him to Opa-locka airport outside Miami at 2 p.m. Thursday.

Her plan called for a plane to take Elian, and any Miami relatives who wanted to come, to Washington, D.C., for a retreat at a neutral site with the boy's father. No Cuban diplomats would be present. After the meeting, the government said, the father would take custody of Elian.

Lazaro Gonzalez said he would not relinquish custody of the boy he has cared for since Elian's mother drowned off the Florida coast nearly five months ago. "We will not turn this child over — not in Opa-locka, not in any 'locka,'" he said.

THE ADVENTURE OF A LIFETIME BEGINS WITH AIR FORCE ROTC

Are you...
- Freshman
- Junior/Senior with 2 semesters/year to go starting fall semester

Air Force ROTC is an elective... but it's far more than that. Air Force ROTC is also a program that teaches you to be a leader, develops your management skills, and helps you grow into a well-rounded and self-assured person. For those who qualify, Air Force ROTC can even help pay for college through its scholarship programs. When you graduate, you'll also become an Air Force officer doing exciting, meaningful things alongside other great people in fascinating places around the world. If you're interested, it's not too late to join. There's no obligation — as a matter of fact, you don't have to decide to join the military until your junior year. So go ahead, give it a try — you won't regret it.

MEETING ON Parking Regulations

A public hearing concerning the 2000-2001 proposed parking regulations will be held in the Salina College Center, Conference Room 103, on April 14th, starting at 11:30 a.m., and running to 1:30 p.m. or unless finished sooner.

The major changes this year are a change eliminating motorcycle permits and permitting use of vehicle permits on motorcycles, and a $5 increase in permit prices to shorten the time needed to build funds for lot replacement.

This meeting is to discuss the proposed changes only, and is not a general parking meeting.

Despite this, he is not likely to be drafted this weekend until somewhere between the second and fifth rounds.

Also dealing with uncertainty this weekend is K-State lineman Damion McIntosh. The 6'4", 326-pound bulldozer excelled as a defensive tackle for K-State from 1997 to 1998, but Lamar Chapman knows what position he'll be playing in the NFL, and it's not the one fans might expect. The former All-Big 12 free safety almost certainly will take his first pro snaps as a cornerback, a position he played only occasionally for the Cats.

Facing perhaps the most uncertainty this weekend is tailback Frank Murphy. The speedster has caught scouts' eyes with his 4.22 40-yard dash time, and also made them cringe at his tentative running style and propensity for fumbling. He is expected to be taken late in the draft, or perhaps to catch on with an NFL club as a free agent.

NFL teams select 5 former K-State football players in draft

By NICK BRATKOVIC
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A sigh of relief could be felt in the homes of the five former K-State football players who were drafted in this weekend's 2000 NFL draft.

"It is a great feeling to know that it is over," former K-State middle linebacker Mark Simoneau said. "It is a relief because it is a long process."

It was a process that started with a dream and transformed into a reality with hard work and dedication.

The Cats' first player to be selected was Darren Howard, who went as the 33rd pick in the draft and the second pick in the second round, by the New Orleans Saints. Howard was unavailable for comment, but his mother, Cynthia Johnson, said she was happy to see her son get selected.

"It was almost like pandemonium," Johnson said. "There was so many things involved from all the hard work to all of the waiting that is involved."

Howard was described by ESPN.com draft expert Tom Donahoe as possibly the best pass rusher in the draft.

"He is very excited to be going to New Orleans and playing," Johnson said.

The next former K-State player to be selected was Simoneau, who said he wasn't sure where he would end up.

"I didn't have a great feel of where I would be picked," Simoneau said. "Atlanta had flown me out, so I knew that they were interested."

Simoneau was the Atlanta

Falcons' third pick and went as the 67th player in the draft. He said it was a relief to finally be drafted.

Simoneau said he will leave for a mini-camp with the Falcons in a couple of weeks and then will report to Atlanta for good in June.

In Atlanta, Simoneau likely will be playing with former K-State linebacker Jeff Kelly, whom Simoneau said he had not yet spoken to.

Damion McIntosh, former offensive lineman, was selected by the San Diego Chargers as the 83rd pick overall and the 21st pick in the third round. He is looked at as a player with the ability to improve on the offensive side of the football, Donahoe said. McIntosh was unavailable for comment Sunday.

Campus biology research to benefit from Ackert Hall expansion

Gold-colored shovels wrapped with purple bows were used by faculty and administrators to break ground Friday afternoon for the 62,000-square-foot expansion of Ackert Hall.

Arts and Sciences Dean Peter Nicholls said the groundbreaking was a significant event for the college.

"The units that are going to benefit from this construction — the Department of Biochemistry, the Division of Biology and the Center for Basic Cancer Research — are very important, indeed, central components of the work that the college does in teaching and research and in outreach," he said.

The lower two floors of the Ackert expansion will house the Department of Biochemistry. The top floor will house the Division of Biology, and the north side of the first floor will house the Center for Basic Cancer Research.

Nicholls said new building will get a much-needed expansion, as Ackert was built 30 years ago, Nicholls said. The Center for Basic Cancer Research will have administrative offices, as well as facilities to support conferences and to be host to alumni and "For the Department of Biochemistry, it will permit a greater centralization of the programs," he said. "It will provide outstanding state of the art research space for biochemistry."

Student Senate works toward diversification

By ANGELA KISTNER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Taking small steps is how Student Body President Jake Worcester describes the Student Governing Association and K-State's goal toward becoming more diverse and more multiculturally aware.

"I don't think we're where we need to be, but we've started taking steps in the right direction," he said.

The step taken this year was the election of one of the most diverse Student Senates in a long time, Worcester said.

"This is due to efforts this year to really push to recognize candidates from more of those diverse backgrounds," he said.

Melissa Valadez, president of the Hispanic American Leadership Organization, was elected as an arts and sciences senator for the 2000-01 Senate term.

"I was interested in Senate views and how they're working on becoming more diversified," she said.

Valadez said getting elected to Senate will give her a chance to represent students better.

"I think I can better represent K-State and represent the population of students, as well as giving a different opinion of someone of a different cultural background," she said.

"I definitely think diversity is an ongoing process in which everybody can grow in."

Korri Hall, president of the Black Student Union and newly elected education senator, said she ran for Senate because she felt it needed a change as far diversity goes.

"I wanted to help make that change," she said.

Neither Hall nor Valadez said they believe K-State is where it needs to be in diversity.

Manhattan's search for a new city manager stepped up this weekend as the five finalists for the position were in town. Mayor Roger Reitz will announce the new city manager today at 8:30 a.m.

City commissioners, who will hire the new manager, released the finalists' names Friday and interviewed the candidates Saturday and Sunday.

The city narrowed the list to five from a pool of 65 applicants. The candidates are Kelly Arnold, city manager for Laramie, Wyo.; Ron Fehr, assistant city manager and acting city manager in Manhattan; Robert K. Hammond, associate superintendent of administration and operations for Wichita public schools; Hiram Watkins, city manager of Columbia, Mo.; and Johann A.

Zacharias, city manager of Hays, Kan.

Manhattan City Commissioner Ed Klimek said there are two huge economic forces in Manhattan — K-State and Fort Riley. He said the new city manager often will work with both.

All the finalists but one have experience working as city managers in communities with universities.

Commissioner Bruce Snead said that's one of the most important things the commissioners considered in interviews and in narrowing the list of candidates.

"It's having experience in dealing with university and community issues. In most university communities, the university is a key or essential element in that community," Snead said. "Relationships, progress and success obviously mean working

Organization raises $7,500 at all-university philanthropy dance-a-thon

By TANNER EHMKE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The campus was brought together Friday night at Ahearn Field House to dance until midnight for the same philanthropy — the all-university Dance-a-Thon.

The House That K-State Built, the organization that sponsored the event, raised $7,500 for Habitat for Humanity to build a house next spring for a family in need of a home.

"Dance-a-Thon involves all organizations on campus: greek, non-greek, residence halls and other organizations," said Mary Bosco, junior in public relations. "It's for anyone and everyone who wants to come out and support us. It's not just one group working on one thing."

The goal was to raise $10,000 for the night, Bosco, one of the event's organizers, said. The entire event was in memory of football defensive coordinator Phil Bennett's wife, Nancy, who was killed last August after being struck by lightning.

The idea was modeled after a similar event at the University of Iowa. The dance-a-thon at the University of Iowa raised more than $300,000, she said. Some dancers even had to be turned away.

More than 50 dancers came to shake a leg at Friday night's contest. For $100, anyone could register to compete for prizes in various dance contests, such as contests for the twist, limbo, Macarena, the chicken dance, swing dance, hula-hoop and Simon says.

Erin Matyak, sophomore in psychology, won a Nintendo 64 for the Simon says contest.

"I think it's a great cause," Matyak said. "I was definitely excited to be a part of it."

Marlin Nabors, graduate student in sociology, also won one of the contests during the night. Nabors was awarded a portable compact disc player for winning the limbo contest.

"This was a great opportunity for residence hall students, greek students and independent students to all collaborate on a project that will benefit the greater Manhattan community," Nabors said.

The contest was scheduled to last until 5 a.m. but, due to low attendance, ended at midnight with a drawing for a television set and a VCR. A total of 35 donors supported the event by donating money, food and prizes. Head football coach Bill Snyder arrived to donate two autographed footballs and books. The K-State Student Union made the largest donation, with a contribution of $500.

Kari Gorrell, sophomore in psychology and pre-dentistry, helped organize the event. Gorrell had heard about the philanthropy through the Student Governing Association and decided to volunteer.

"I like to do things to help out the community," Gorrell said. "I jumped at the opportunity to get involved."

Despite the low attendance, Bosco said she considered the philanthropy a success and plans to make the dance-a-thon an annual event, with modifications made for next year. Bosco plans to require preregistration with a lower dancer fee next year.

"We would have liked to have had 100 dancers, but people are apprehensive to do it the first time," Bosco said. "We did really well for the first time. This is just the first step to raising money."

Web publication of records of sex offenders under fire

WICHITA — The state's policy of posting names and addresses of convicted sexual offenders on the Internet is being challenged in court.

The state Supreme Court is scheduled to consider arguments today that the Kansas Bureau of Investigation, which has posted the information on its Web site for three years, is going too far in releasing the records of sex offenders.

The Kansas Offenders Registration Act was created to let residents know if a neighbor has been convicted of a sex crime or violent offense.

The law specifies only that the information be available for public inspection in the sheriff's office — not via computer.

Several states have such laws, but only Michigan, Indiana and Alaska join Kansas in posting offenders lists on the Internet.

The appeal filed in 1998 by Sedgwick County Public Defenders Charles Osburn and Phillip Weiser uses the case of Edward B. Wilkinson, 45, as the basis for their motion.

Wilkinson, who has been serving two years probation on a Wichita sex-crime conviction, said he was unaware of his involvement in the case.

"I've just been doing what I was supposed to do and getting along fine," Wilkinson said.

The Supreme Court can choose which cases it will consider from those on appeal to the Kansas Court of Appeals. That's what it did with Wilkinson.

"Typically, if a case is of statewide importance or interest, that could be a criteria," said Ron Keefover of the Office of Judicial Administration.

A ruling could sort out some confusion in just how public the sex offenders' registry needs to be.

Kansas adopted its public reporting requirements for sex offenders in 1994. In April 1997, the KBI began posting offenders' names and addresses on its Web site.

Mary Tritsch, spokeswoman for Kansas Attorney General Carla Stovall, said the KBI took the opportunity to give the public wider access to public records.

"She decided, why not give the public the ability to get it off the Web through the KBI?" Tritsch said. "The attorney general believes the public has a right to know."

Historic New York building makes 30 floors residences

NEW YORK — Looking for a primo Manhattan pad to go with your high-flying Internet startup?

Just $6 million or more could buy an entire upper floor of an Old Economy landmark — the neo-Gothic, 60-story Woolworth Building, once the world's tallest building.

Developer-owner Steven Witkoff is making residences of the top 30 floors of the building Frank W. Woolworth erected in 1913.

It was headquarters for his five-and-dime chain for 85 years.

It held the tallest skyscraper claim until the Chrysler Building was built in 1929.

Across from City Hall and blocks from the financial district, the building has an ornate terra cotta exterior designed by Cass Gilbert.

The white-marble lobby features Tiffany stained-glass panels and colored-glass mosaics embedded in its vaulted ceilings.

Architects are planning the redesign of the upper floors now, and real estate firms have toured the space.

Guesses on the prices put the penthouse at $12 million and lower floors at half that.

The three-story penthouse in the building's spire will have access via a private glass elevator to Frank Woolworth's own wraparound terrace.

Even lower floors will have views of the Brooklyn Bridge, New York Harbor, midtown Manhattan and the Hudson River.

Other amenities could include a wine cellar, cigar lounge, business center, private dining room and a health club complete with Woolworth's private pool.

"There will be tremendous ego gratification to saying that you live on top of the Woolworth Building," said Pam Liebman, CEO of the up-market real estate firm the Corcoran Group.

"There's nothing else in the city like it," she said.

Manhattan residents participate in Kansas Special Olympics northeast area tournament

By lunchtime Saturday, Jeff O'Malley had three gold medals around his neck.

Not bad for someone who wanted to back out of his bicycle races slated for Saturday morning in the Memorial Stadium parking lot.

This was due to the fact that O'Malley had never been in a race before, his mom, Judy O'Malley, said. Because they had only found out about the Kansas Special Olympics northeast area aquatic, cycling and power-lifting tournament two weeks ago, it was all the more reason to be nervous, she said.

If there were any jitters left for the 26-year-old Manhattan resident, they were gone after the races.

"I feel great," Jeff O'Malley said with a radiant smile after winning the 5K race. "Around the last leg, I knew I could do it. I smoked it."

More than 130 athletes converged on the Ahearn complex Saturday for the meet.

All of the participants automatically qualify to move on to the state meet in June at Wichita State University.

Saline County resident Jeremy Hicks power lifted 450 pounds, Northeast Area Director Debbi DeVenuto said.

DeVenuto said that very well could be a state record, but that she would have to check with the state office to make the confirmation.

"It's at least a record in our area, as we've never had that event before," she said.

Swimming is another new event to the program, added about two years ago, volunteer Cathy Waugh said.

Nearly 80 people participated in that event, including 10-year-old Jacob Johnson of Topeka.

"I got close to last," he said after finishing the 25-meter freestyle. "But I'm the only one out there who couldn't have a beard or moustache."

He was also the only one who couldn't walk.

Johnson usually plays wheelchair soccer on Saturdays with the Capper Foundation but took the day off to be in Manhattan.

"He's real athletic," said Chelsea Canham, the Capper representative with Johnson. "He requested one time to play wheelchair football with us."

For DeVenuto, that shows exactly what the Special Olympics is all about.

"Just because someone (has a disability) doesn't mean they can't do anything," she said.

That's exactly what Judy O'Malley has been telling her son for years.

"We've always tried to get Jeff involved because he didn't always excel academically," Judy O'Malley said. "This gives him positive reinforcement about himself."

She said it was about 14 years ago when he realized he was different than other people.

He was diagnosed with Attention Deficit Disorder as child. Judy O'Malley said it was hard for him to come to terms with his disability.

"When he discovered he was different from others he was angry," she said. "He didn't want to be different."

The community — including area Kiwanis clubs and several K-State community service fraternities — all assisted with Saturday's Olympics.

"They're saying 'you're okay, and we accept you,'" Judy O'Malley said. "That part of it helps them accept themselves."

Manhattan resident Jeff O'Malley raises his hand as he breaks through the finish-line ribbon in Saturday's 5K race.

Varney's, K-State Student Union Bookstore to offer online book-ordering next fall

By BEN HOPPER

KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

The possibility of online book-ordering next fall will leave fewer battle scars because of reduced crowds, local textbook vendors and their patrons hope.

"It would be very time-efficient for my busy schedule," said Rachel Crane, senior in family studies and human service.

"If it was convenient to go pick them up, I would, but I would probably have them delivered."

Varney's Book Store and the K-State Union Bookstore are working to provide students the options of ordering and paying for their textbooks online.

Varney's manager Jeff Levin said there is a need and desire for such a service.

"We saw a growing trend in online purchasing, but students would prefer to have a local store than one of the bigger sites," he said.

General merchandise, such as K-State apparel, will be for sale on the Web in May or June, he said. The order form for the textbooks will be ready this summer.

"We can't sell a book until a professor decides what textbook to use," he said.

The site will have a Web camera with video shots from Aggieville, along with campus and community events.

"We are trying to have fun with it," Levin said.

The Union Bookstore also is looking into online textbook ordering, bookstore operations manager Craig Johnson said.

Johnson said two companies are under investigation and are writing some of the coding themselves. The store will have to get online and credit-card capabilities.

"We're doing it in steps," he said. "We have not fully decided on what we are going to do."

The Union Bookstore offered this service last fall for two months, Johnson said.

The store bought the software, but used an outside company's server.

"We had sufficient staff," he said. "It didn't require any extra staff or scheduling."

The company went bankrupt in mid-October, discontinuing online purchasing.

Students still can print a pre-order from online, he said.

"Online ordering is a high priority and a goal of ours, but there are some steps to get there," he said.

Crane said she has pre-ordered textbooks online twice.

"It was convenient," she said. "All

I had to do was order my books and then go pick them up, and they were ready for me."

Dance-a-Thon excellent attempt at inclusiveness

Friday's all-university Dance-a-thon was an excellent step toward uniting K-State in support of a worthy cause.

The Dance-a-thon was a philanthropy sponsored by The House That K-State Built. Its goal was to raise $10,000 for Manhattan Habitat for Humanity to build a house next spring for a family in need of a home.

Unlike most philanthropies at K-State, however, this one was not just for the greek population. It was planned to include greeks and non-greeks, residence hall students and off-campus commuters.

Although the philanthropy failed to reach its monetary goal, the event was a success in other ways.

Dance-a-thon raised $7,500, which will be donated in memory of defensive coordinator Phil Bennett's wife, Nancy, who was killed in August after being struck by lightning.

Obviously, any money that can be raised for a worthwhile cause such as Habitat for Humanity is a success.

The true success, though, was the initiative that was shown and the progress made toward creating an event in which all of campus can work together for a worthy cause.

Greeks on campus traditionally have been more involved than independents. They have boasted higher participation in philanthropies such as this one.

However, the cooperation this event could lead to would lessen that gap and allow more efficient work to be done.

There were flaws with Friday's event, to be sure. It failed to reach its monetary goal. Only about 50 people showed up to participate in the night of dancing.

The event even ended several hours

earlier than originally planned.

But it is a start. It is a move toward more people on campus working together for a single cause.

Such unity will benefit not only the recipients of the money raised, but also those who participate.

OUR VIEW, an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board, is written after a majority opinion is formed. OUR VIEW is the Collegian's official opinion.

The Collegian's Reader Fourum is an anonymous call-in system that allows readers to voice their opinions on any topic for 20 seconds.

For the greeks: Ken Wells was just trying to prove a point that even though you guys give yourselves so much hype, you aren't as perfect as you think you are. We all have our faults. Your major fault just happens to be that some of you beat up your pledges.

David Levin: I triple-dog-dare you to write about the hypocrisy of your buddy, Al Gore.

We don't need to hear Ken Wells' opinion on being greek, since the closest he's ever been to being greek is eating a calzone.

I think "Gongfarmers" should be renamed "Stupid Cartoon."

I think it's real neat how the Collegian lets fourth-graders draw the cartoons for its editorials.

I just wanted to know if anyone else thought it was idiotic that a larger percentage of our privilege fees go to athletics than the library.

I don't hear about too many greek people getting Trumans.

Any true K-State fan knows that the other four K-State players to get drafted are Damien McIntosh, Frank Murphy, Lamar Chapman and Darren Howard.

Thursday's paper was a waste of paper.

To all those who Our View represents: you guys are a bunch of commies.

I'd like to give credit to the grounds crew and whoever else makes this campus one of the prettiest places to walk at any time of the year.

For sale: 95 15-foot-long aluminum bleachers. Call me.

This message is for all the people who sit outside of Eisenhower and smoke: go away.

Wanted: new drug dealers. Pay: negotiable. Benefits: not so good.

You bash Goodpasture, and you're messing with the whole family.

Hayworth, you did a good job.

Congratulations, Reed, on becoming the new editor. But before you do, I think you should take a trip to Colby, Kansas — "oasis on the plains."

About Lafene: My friend went into Lafene with a sore throat last semester, and they told her she had tonsillitis. But she had her tonsils taken out six years ago.

I say no to equestrian as an additional women's sport.

How many times do I have to call this damned thing before you'll put me in the paper?

I am not greek. I do not buy my friends. I do not have to have a T-shirt made for every weekend party. I do not have to put an ad in the paper to invite women to that party.

This is to the editor of the Opinion page. Why did you run another flag-burning column by Travis Weigel, because he has basically just copied.

I looked at the front page and, alas, I couldn't tell what day it was.

I would just like to thank Derby Dining Center for the lovely view of a cockroach crawling on my newspaper while I was eating breakfast.

STATE OF THE UNION

Privilege fees should be used for education, not Starbucks

$11.5 million is a lot of money, which I am sure any of you out there would be more than happy to have in your possession.

What would you do with $11.5 million if you had it?

Now, what would you do with $11.5 million if you were a university?

I ask this, because the funny thing about $11.5 million is that, collectively, we do have that much money. What do we do with it? We give it to K-State.

Giving our money to K-State is not the problem, as it provides for us many services and a necessary education. The problem lies in what the university does with the money once it is in their possession.

Let's go back in time a bit, and I'll give you a personal example to illustrate my point. I tried to enroll last week. Not an unusual occurrence around here.

In my major, I have one important prerequisite left before I am let loose on all my other requirements for graduation. This class is a prerequisite for just about every concentration in the A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communications, meaning just about everyone and their dog has to take it. The funny thing about this class is that there is only one section of it offered.

So, to make a long story short, the class was full, and here I am, a junior next year, who cannot even take classes in my major. But, at the time, I just dealt with it and put myself on the waiting list, which probably is 1,000 people long.

Later that week, I just happened to walk into the K-State Student Union and read one of the sandwich boards which are set up to explain the construction going on. The first line explains that the construction is an $11.5 million project "funded by students for students." I stopped to think about this for a while and began to feel the bitterness rise inside of me.

Here's a synopsis of my thoughts: you mean to tell me that the university can take my money to "fix" a perfectly functional Union, yet they can't use it for its intended use, namely to educate me?

More specifically, use the money to open more sections of classes that are in high demand but low supply.

Again, later that week, another experience forced me to recall a large sum of money being spent on the Union. I was on campus at 10 a.m. for a 10:30 a.m. class, yet I still was late to class.

I'm sure none of you need to ask why, as I am pretty positive this happens often.

You see, I couldn't find a place to park. So I drove around for 30 minutes before someone left and I could take over their coveted spot.

I'm not going to go on a rampage about parking because it's been done before.

However, it does apply to my beef when I start to think about the millions being spent on the Union.

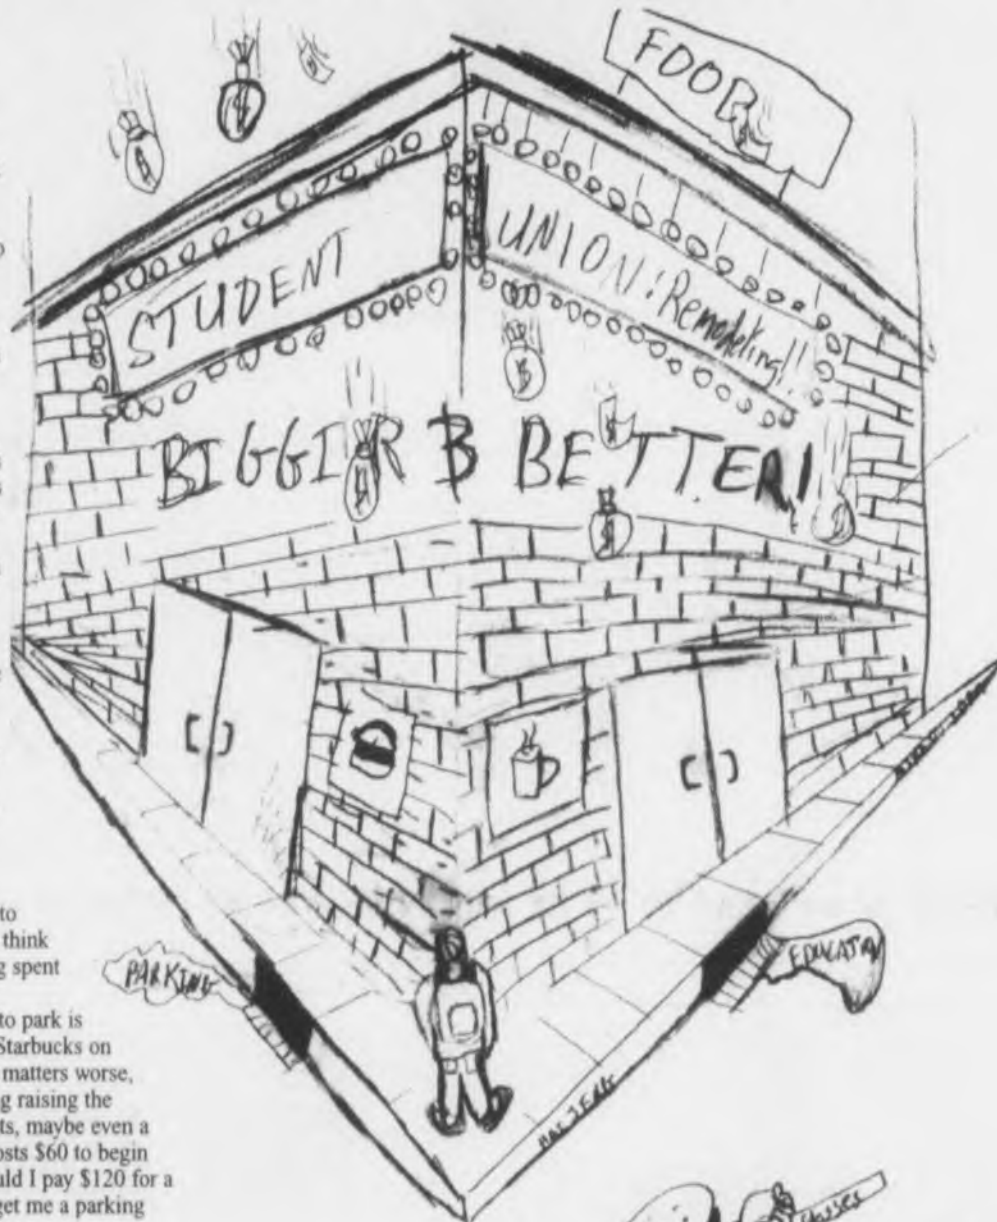

In my head, a place to park is more important than a Starbucks on campus. Then, to make matters worse, K-State is contemplating raising the prices of parking permits, maybe even a $60 raise. My permit costs $60 to begin with. Why on earth would I pay $120 for a permit that hardly can get me a parking space?

Then it dawned on me. They don't want me to have a parking spot, and they don't want me to take the classes I need.

Why, you ask? Because if I have to attend school for an extra semester or buy a permit, despite the price, because I live too far away to do anything else, the university gets more money.

I think this is the same reason that the money is being spent on the Union.

If the Union is prettier and fancier, we might entice more students, and more students equals more tuition and fees, which in turn equals more money to spend on stuff we don't really need.

Exaggerated, perhaps. Bitter, you bet. For all I know, there might be some administrative reason why they spend the money on the Union and not on students, but the bottom line is, I don't care.

If we are going to fund the university with enough money to basically rebuild the Union, shouldn't we get something from it directly? I am paying for an education, and I am getting entertainment and food.

The university needs to reassess the way it spends money, even though it is too late for us. The Union already is under construction.

We can't just leave the fences up and the ground torn out forever. But, just as the ground can be mended, so can finances. Let's just remember that past wrongs can be remedied by future rights. More importantly, one day we'll be alumni. They really have a say around here.

Environmental extremism threatens property rights

The construction of a hospital in Colton, Calif., was well under way when the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service ordered the construction moved 300 feet, at a cost of $3 million.

The Southern California county of San Bernardino cannot go ahead with numerous economic-development projects until it comes up with $100 million for land acquisitions to protect wildlife. Included in the held-up projects are sewer construction and flood-control. The city of Colton alone estimates it is in danger of losing between $300 million and $500 million in commercial projects.

Why? To protect the endangered Delhi Sands flower-loving fly. Most people, if they saw it in their home, probably would kill it with a fly swatter. Meanwhile, humans must go without needed medical facilities to preserve it.

This is but one example of a continuing threat to property rights, economic freedom and the public good — environmental extremism.

Yet, at the other end of the spectrum lie different but equally horrible scenarios. Third-world countries and former communist nations are replete with examples of people living next to — or even in — toxic waste and sewage, not to mention continuing problems in the United States with air pollution and waste disposal.

All too often, particularly in America, where environmental awareness is growing, advocacy groups looking for political power and money are all too eager to exploit this awareness. Global warming is a good example.

According to MIT meteorology professor Richard Lindzen, "a recent Gallup poll of climate scientists in the American Meteorological Society and the American Geophysical Union shows that a vast majority doubts that there has been any identifiable man-caused warming to date. Forty-nine percent asserted no, 33 percent did not know, 18 percent thought some has occurred; however, among those actively involved in research and publishing frequently in peer-reviewed research journals, none believes that any man-caused global warming has been identified so far."

On the other hand, the problem of the ozone hole is much more substantiated. It has been proven, with about as much certainty as is possible in environmental science, that the ozone hole over Antarctica was caused by man-made CFCs. Another tactic of extremists is to demonize certain people or industries. Two favorite targets are the chemical industry and farmers.

Yes, in the past the chemical industry, like all other industries, often damaged the environment. But this fundamentally important industry often has led the way in developing environmentally friendly technologies and environmental cleanup.

As for farmers, many people fail to realize they are probably the one group of people in this country doing the most to care for the environment — preventing erosion, reducing waste, trying to reduce the amount of man-made toxins entering nature and often fighting vigilantly to protect nature. People often accuse farmers of harming the environment with pesticide usage, but according to my organic chemistry textbook, we consume about 10,000 times more natural pesticides than man-made pesticides each day. If for no other reason, those involved in agricultural production care for the environment because they depend on it and live in it constantly.

Attacking certain people or industries and using scare tactics to play up minimal or unproven problems such as overpopulation and global warming is not constructive. What we should be doing is taking the action we can to throw less away, both personally and industrially. What we need to be doing is working to develop new technologies that are cleaner and more efficient.

I should mention that my family recycles almost religiously and has for many years. Paper, cardboard, milk jugs, glass, tin, aluminum, used car batteries and used motor oil — if we can recycle it in Abilene, we probably do.

We want to have clean air and water, a safe food supply, the opportunity to enjoy nature unspoiled. What we are wary of, however, are calls for increased government power and intervention to place insects above human needs and to solve nonexistent problems.

Too many people, faced only with the two extremes of disregard for the environment and radical environmentalism, simply throw up their hands.

As a result, they fail to take wise and practical action and leave the entire issue in the hands of those least capable of doing anything constructive.

How, then, should we respond? What should be our attitude toward the environment?

First and foremost, we must acknowledge that human beings are more valuable than plants and animals. People are not a scourge upon the Earth. The Earth exists for us and not we for it. It is not evil to make use of the natural resources provided for us.

Second, we must acknowledge that we have a responsibility, both morally and practically, to care for the Earth, use its resources wisely, to keep our air, water and soil clean.

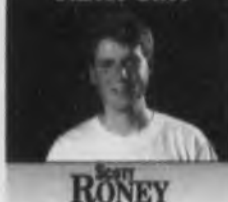

Third, environmental policy must be driven by solid science and sound economics, not by politics or emotion. If someone wants to worship trees, they may do so all they want, but if they want to impose a regulation to protect trees, it had better be supported by scientific facts and be justifiable economically.

It is vital that we avoid the extremes both of radical environmentalism and complete disregard for the environment. We need a sound and balanced approach. The three principles I have outlined above can provide an excellent basis for successfully achieving this goal.

I also would add that for those wanting to take a more active role in doing something positive and constructive to protect the environment, the newly formed organization Students for Environmental Action would be a great place to get involved.

Sunset Zoo patrons learn about recycling, compost

By COLLEGIAN STAFF

Guests of Sunset Zoological Park could learn about recycling, soil conservation and make their own compost piles Saturday at the annual Environmental Fair and Human Health Expo in celebration of Earth Day.

Amy Dix, junior in biochemistry and co-founder of Students for Environmental Action, worked a booth that demonstrated soil and water quality at the expo.

"We want to stop damage to the soil to prevent harm to us and the environment," she said.

People who visited the booth were greeted with posterboards detailing recycling and soil quality. The group booth also had seeds, biodegradable pots and soil.

Dix said she decided to eat all organic, non-genetically modified foods, but it's a personal choice.

"GMO pesticides do affect the ecosystem," she said.

Ben Champion, junior in chemistry, said he was there working in the SEA booth because educating the public about soil and the ecosystem is important.

"Soil is everything," he said. "It affects our plants we grow and grain we harvest. It also affects our meat we eat since our animals graze. It can lead to water pollution from run off."

Champion said soil quality also was linked to recycling, which the SEA booth also focused on.

"Our landfills are, of course, linked to soil quality, because they're in the ground and water can seep into that and create run off."

He said recycling encourages people to use things to their fullest potential.

"We do have a limited amount of resources on the planet," he said.

"So we need to care for those we have. Eventually we will run out."

Although turnout was less than expected due to overcast skies, Champion said he thought the SEA booth was a success.

"I would say that we had a good time and talked with quite a few people," he said. "I think we succeeded at least in a small part."

Corey Nolder, 8, also said the day was a success, though the environment wasn't his primary concern.

He was really excited about the monkeys.

"I got to see them run against the wall," he said.

Ford Hall fund-raisers to top human sundaes

By NANCY FOSTER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Whipped cream and flavored syrup usually are put on top of ice cream, but at 9 tonight, Ford Hall residents won't be making ice cream sundaes; they'll be making "R.A. sundaes."

As the award for participating in Penny Wars, a fund-raiser for the March of Dimes, residents from each floor will receive varying amounts of toppings to put on the 10 residence assistants. The whipped cream and syrup will be distributed to each floor based on the place it received during the Penny Wars competition.

The first floor, which raised the most pennies, will receive 10 cans of whipped cream and several bottles of chocolate, caramel and strawberry syrup to put on the two first-floor resident assistants.

Jaime Snitker, first-floor resident assistant, said getting messy will be well worth the cause.

"I'm really excited about it," she said. "I'm glad we raised money for the whole project. I just hope I can get everything out of my hair."

Tammy Osborn, first-floor president, said the competition raised about $110, with first place bringing in $32 worth of pennies. She said the resident assistants proposed the human sundae idea to the Hall Governing Board earlier in the year, and after being approved, decided it should be this year's Penny Wars award.

"It's going to be pretty crazy," Osborn said. "It'll be out on the front lawn, so hopefully everyone will see it. We just wanted to let the girls know we appreciated them raising money."

Sarah Grover, freshman in secondary education, said she can't wait for the event to begin.

"I'm so excited because we won — so we get to put the most amount of toppings on our R.A.," Grover said.

She said her floor raised money by going room to room collecting pennies and by playing it smart when receiving change.

"Whenever I got change, I would ask for pennies instead of quarters," Grover said.

Though the resident assistants are the ones getting messy, they aren't the ones who will have to clean up the mess, which is one reason they decided to have the event outside.

"I think it's a really good idea because it cuts down on us having to clean stuff up, and it gets more people involved," Grover said. "People who drive by will want to come back."

Snitker said being outside was a good idea in order to cut down on the mess.

"It should be fun," she said. "And at least I'm not going to have to clean it up."

K-State baseball team wins with run-rule victory

By JOSHUA KINDER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State's 24-4 run-rule victory Sunday over Howard at Frank Myers Field looked more like a recreational slow-pitch softball game than a baseball game.

The Wildcats (15-20) used 24 hits, a nine-run second and an eight-run fifth to dispose of the Bison (10-35) en route to their sixth straight victory, a streak that started April 7-9 with two triumphs over the Oklahoma State Cowboys at Myers Field.

"Our whole philosophy today was that if we could get them down, we didn't think they would fight real hard," K-State head coach Mike Clark said. "We wanted to capitalize on our opportunities early, which we did. And then, once we got into that situation, get as many people as many at-bats as we could."

Cats' senior pitcher Jason Wells (3-5) enjoyed perhaps his best performance of the season, yielding just three hits and one run in 6 1/3 innings, striking out eight and walking two. Wells also earned the victory April 9 with a solid outing against Oklahoma State.

"Jason threw extremely well for us today," Clark said. "He did a great job."

After giving up a run to the Bison in the top of the first, K-State scored twice in the bottom of the first and then nine more in the second.

Senior second baseman Chad

Tabor, junior left fielder Kasey Weishaar, freshman designated hitter Pat Maloney and junior center fielder Chris Nelson all had RBI singles. Junior first baseman Mark English, who was 4-for-6 with four RBI and four runs scored in the game, added a two-run double to the scoring barrage.

"Offensively, we weren't satisfied with anything," Clark said. "The guys had quality at-bats, even two or three times we scored a lot of runs with two outs. The guys really did a good job."

The fifth inning was much of the same for the Bison, who retired the first two K-State batters of the inning and then gave up six hits and eight more runs. Junior right fielder Ben Oleen, junior second baseman Josh Cavender and English each drove in two runs in the inning.

For K-State, which plays William Woods on Wednesday and resumes Big 12 Conference play this weekend at Iowa State, the six-game winning streak can be attributed to big bats and consistent pitching.

English has led the way during the streak, batting .600 with 15 RBI and 14 runs scored, and carrying a 1.105 slugging percentage.

Clark said he has seen English hit like this, but that was two years ago.

"He was on fire then," Clark said. "He went through a 10- or 12-game stretch when he hit everything on the barrel. He's doing an excellent job and in a good stretch right now."

Kansas Cup to stay in Lawrence after KU sweep

The Kansas Cup will stay in Lawrence for another year after the Cats were swept on Saturday.

Despite that fact, K-State head women's crew coach Jenny Hale said she was able to find positives in the team's performance, with improvement at the varsity level.

"We were able to drop our flat margin of loss in the Varsity Eight race from 17 seconds a couple of weeks ago against Kansas, to four seconds this weekend," Hale said.

Hale said she was pleased with the rowers' effort, because Kansas had entered the matches on a roll after winning the Knecht Cup and defeating Massachusetts, a nationally ranked school, last weekend. The school carried over its winning ways, turning its home course on the Kansas River shades of crimson and blue.

K-State struggled throughout the day to combat the weather and water conditions, but Hale said the team improved.

In the Varsity Eight race, Kansas finished the race with a time of 7:28.7, defeating the Cats, who finished with a time of 7:32.4. Kansas continued its winning ways in the Second Varsity Eight with a time of 7:47.5, and the Cats rowed a time of 7:57.9. Hale said a slow start in the race jeopardized the Cats' chances.

"Our Second Varsity Eight boat got a slow start and was never able to recover," Hale said. "They made some progress in closing the gap and turned in a great sprint at the end, but it was not enough to change the race."

K-State's Varsity Four struggled as well, losing by more than a half a minute to the Kansas A boat. The Novice Eight race was close, but the Cats were defeated by less than three seconds by the Kansas A. The Novice Four also was defeated by a margin of

The K-State women's crew rows against KU at the Kansas Cup regatta on Saturday morning. The team will travel to Madison, Wis., this weekend.

14 seconds.

Kansas senior Varsity Eight rower Risa Petty said a key to the race was overcoming the elements.

"It was about survival out there," Petty said. "It was pretty crazy with the weather conditions and all."

For K-State, freshman Karen Wadhams said it wasn't one of the team's better performances.

"It was just not our day," Wadhams said. "We got off to a hard start and never recovered."

After the race, the Kansas Cup was presented to Kansas. The Cats' next race, the Midwestern Sprint Championships, will take place Friday and Saturday in Madison, Wis.

Tennis team loses to Texas, Texas A&M in away matches

It was a rough weekend for the K-State women's tennis team as it traveled to Texas and was defeated both Saturday and Sunday.

The K-State tennis team was defeated, 6-3, by No. 49 Texas A&M on Saturday. It was a match that came down to singles play for the Cats, as they lost all three doubles matches.

"It was a tough match, and we were able to tie it at three following singles," K-State assistant coach Dinah Watson said. "We just couldn't do it doubles. No. 1 and No. 2 doubles were both close, but we just couldn't get over the top."

In singles play, the Cats received strong performances from Alena Jecminkova who played in the No. 1 singles and defeated Martina Nedorostova, 7-6.

At the No. 2 doubles Petra Sedlmajerova defeated Leah Killen, 6-1, 6-3. The two schools ended singles play tied, but K-State fell short in doubles action.

On Sunday, the Cats suffered another defeat to No. 7 Texas. K-State entered the day looking to rebound from the day before but was defeated, 8-1, by Texas.

The Longhorns lost just one singles match and increased their conference winning streak to 104 matches. The losses drop the Cats to 12-7, 7-3.

K-State's lone victory in the contest came at the No. 3 doubles, where Kathy Chuda and Vesselina Jeliazkova defeated Texas' Michelle Faucher and Pauline Trinchant, 8-3.

The Cats return home for a week, before taking on Nebraska in their final regular season match Saturday in Lincoln, Neb.

Coaches name Ramage MVP at team ceremony Saturday

The K-State women's basketball team announced its team awards Saturday in a ceremony in the K, S and U room in the K-State Student Union.

K-State coaches named senior forward Nicky Ramage their most valuable player.

Ramage led her team in scoring, averaging 13.2 points per game, while scoring in double figures 24 times during the 1999-2000 season.

It was also a big night for junior Morgen Finneran, who earned the team's most improved player award. During the season, she doubled her stats in several key categories, including minutes played, assists and steals.

The night was also a chance for the K-State program to recognize the senior class of forward Angie Finkes, Ramage, Olga Firsova, Jenny Coalson and team manager Jason Ramos.

The banquet capped off the teams season that finished 13-17 overall with a 6-10 Big 12 record.

— briefs by Nick Bratkovic

Fans should rally behind dedicated, accomplished K-State rowing team

VIEWPOINT

NICK BRATKOVIC

K-State fans looking for a new team to rally behind, please read the following.

There is a team that you can embrace and get behind. A team that practices every day at 5:45 a.m. and makes the long road trips by car to play. A team that basically has been living in obscurity — until now.

The K-State rowing team.

It is an organization that is built on discipline and hard work.

The rowers are governed by code.

No, it's not unit, core, God or country, but rather terms like Varsity Eight, Second Varsity Eight, Novice Eight and Varsity Four. Now, don't let those terms scare you away from this sport. It is too much fun for that and not really all that complicated.

A Varsity Eight would be like the "A" team, the one everyone wanted to be on as a young basketball player. Or, in other words, the name of the show that Mr. T made famous.

Second Varsity Eight would be like the

"B" team, and, well, you get the point. These athletes are different and they, like in any other sport, have a certain way of talking about things.

They use terminology like "blade work." Now, I hear those two words and think that something is caught in a lawn mower. Saturday, I discovered that it had to do with the action of the blade during a stroke and includes a variety of techniques.

There are other unusual words like "breakage," which is the damage to the boat or equipment. All right, now that is not as bad as say, feathering, the action of turning the oar blade parallel to surface of water during recovery.

Still, none of that vocabulary really matters to the novice fan who attended the Kansas Cup on Saturday.

In the four races that day, K-State rowers were battling the clock, KU and the weather. Rowers said the water was treacherous, and it would be hard to doubt them. The Cats came up short in the score, but not in heart.

Crew is truly a sport that is more affected by the weather than any other.

The story got even greater as the day progressed. As the rowing was completed, the rowers did something even more unusual — they ate with those people they earlier had worked so diligently to defeat.

Coaches and athletes from the two schools talked of how dining together promoted positive relations, and it was refreshing to see two teams bond off the field over beef brisket and baked beans.

This is what collegiate athletics are supposed to be about. When athletics first were introduced to university life, it was not done to earn multimillion-dollar television contracts. It was a simpler time then, and athletics were not the big business they are today.

Despite the big business, the women's crew team seems to be back in time, and let's hope that the times never change there. The purity is important for K-State athletics and sports in general. They help to take away from the negative and inspire those who are disenchanted on Saturday mornings.

There has been a lot of talk recently about the different K-State athletes who do not seem to fulfill their obligations and their recent troubles.

Such charges or acts can make you question the purple allegiance and cast a diminishing shadow on Willie the Wildcat's domain. It is a shadow that overcasts all of the high-quality accomplishments taking place in sports like crew and women's tennis. Maybe it is time for K-State fans to find a new favorite Wildcat team, or at least take a look around.

It's worth a shot, because you never know what you might find. A whole new language or passion for a new game could come to you.

Thousands march on capital, fail to stop finance meeting

By LARRY MARGASAK
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Thousands of marchers failed to stop world finance leaders from meeting Sunday, but paraded through the capital in a spirited show of celebration and anger that provoked one ugly episode — a tear gas attack on a surging crowd.

Festive street theater with giant puppets coexisted with pushy confrontations between police and protesters agitating about the plight of the poor and the decadence of the rich.

At one point, police in riot gear and on motorcycles charged into a crowd that had surged toward the police line. Tear gas and pepper spray drove the protesters back.

Unlike the protests that overwhelmed police and smashed windows in rainy Seattle at trade meetings late last year, the weekend demonstrations were largely nonviolent — and the sun beamed on them Sunday.

"I've seen a whole lot less property damage than after a Bulls game in Chicago," said Han Shan, a protest organizer from the San Francisco-based group Ruckus.

Police in America's security-savvy capital accomplished their No. 1 objective for Sunday, sending buses under the cover of early morning darkness to pick up world finance ministers at their hotels — and using circuitous routes and U-turns to get them to work.

But some VIPs were stranded: the finance ministers of France, Brazil and Thailand were thwarted by the crowds and sat at the Watergate Hotel five hours after the meetings started, wondering what to do. They eventually made it to the spring meeting of the International Monetary Fund.

"I think there is a great misunderstanding," French Finance Minister Laurent Fabius said.

Police, who estimated as many as 10,000 protesters were on the streets, blocked off about a 50-block area of downtown but let demonstrators largely have their way outside the security zone.

Shan credited police with being relatively restrained, if suffocating in the size of their force. "Overall, they maintained their composure quite a bit," he said. "They have brutalized a few people without provocation."

The atmosphere was less tense than on Saturday, when police raided and closed the protest headquarters during the day and arrested more than 600 people in the evening.

Fewer than 20 were arrested Sunday, said Terry Gainer, executive assistant police chief. He said two police officers were hospitalized, one with back pain and another from heat exhaustion.

In a day that began with a drizzle but turned nice, the protesters chanted, beat on plastic buckets and wore big papier-mache puppet heads cast in the likeness of the leaders they hold in contempt.

It was all meant to disrupt the World Bank and IMF meetings being occurring Sunday and today.

The anger sprang from a bazaar of causes, everything from human rights atrocities in Ethiopia to the "prison industrial complex" and biotechnology in food.

"Keep your genes out of our beans," read one T-shirt.

"In all your decadence people die," read a sign.

Protesters were united in accusing the World Bank and IMF of burdening poor countries with crushing debt payments, unsafe food, environmental destruction and sweatshops. They said the institutions let wealthy countries set an agenda that "saps the poor to fatten the rich," as Jobs with Justice put it.

Responded Michael Moore, director general of the World Trade Organization: "Blaming the World Bank for poverty is a bit like blaming the Red Cross for starting World Wars I and II."

Moore, an observer at these meetings, witnessed far more destructive behavior in Seattle late last year, when bands of demonstrators trashed property and tens of thousands of marchers overwhelmed police.

While protesters linked arms to block intersections near the World Bank and IMF buildings, they mainly succeeded in keeping out people such as private security guard Robert Covington, of Forestville, Md. "This is ridiculous," he said. "All I want to do is go to work."

A group of demonstrators, some holding sections of chain link fence, charged toward motorcycle police and an anti-riot squad dressed all in black.

Police counterattacked with clubs and six to nine volleys of tear gas grenades, said Associated Press radio reporter Ross Simpson, who was both tear-gassed and clubbed.

Stunned demonstrators were dragged away by their friends and taken to medical teams standing by with jugs of water to flush eyes.

Kate Standish, 19, of Wesleyan University in Middletown, Conn., handed out carrots, granola and water.

She wore a sign that said "Food."

Most demonstrators appeared to be in their 20s, but some, like Elizabeth Burke, 66, of Santa Barbara, Calif., have been activists for decades.

"In Vietnam, some jumped on the handwagon to save their own skin," Burke said. But here, "Nobody's going to be drafted, so here it's different."

Washington Mayor Tony Williams said, "Whenever you're dealing with a situation like this you're going to be up on the boundary line in terms of constitutional rights. But our police have to do their job."

Thousands gathered at the Ellipse, a park area near the White House, to listen to speeches and stage the day's main march.

At the head of the parade was a huge puppet, its sunny yellow face standing 10 feet tall, and its outstretched arms holding a banner saying "Globalize Liberation."

Much of the action swirled around the White House, itself an island of serenity. Police horses munched hay in nearby trailers.

President Clinton was out of town.

Police recommend indictment of Israeli official on sex assault

By SARI BASHI
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

JERUSALEM — Dealing Israel's scandal-rocked government another blow, police recommended Sunday that Yitzhak Mordechai, a senior minister and former prime ministerial candidate, be prosecuted for sexual assault.

The recommendation was not likely to harm Prime Minister Ehud Barak's coalition, in which Mordechai serves as transportation minister. It might, however, further erode public trust in government, already shaken by a series of police investigations of senior officials.

Female lawmakers said the investigation would encourage other women who have been harassed or assaulted to complain to police.

Wrapping up a five-week investigation, police said they had evidence that Mordechai had forced himself on three women who apparently worked for him when he served first as an army general and then as a government minister.

The allegations of "debased acts carried out with force" — in effect, sexual assault — are more serious than the sexual harassment accusations originally made last month by a 23-year-old subordinate at Mordechai's Transport Ministry.

Police handed the recommendations to prosecutors, who must now decide whether to indict.

In a statement, Mordechai continued to maintain his innocence and said he hopes prosecutors will choose to dismiss the accusations. If they don't, he said, he will fight the allegations in court.

"The police recommendations are only the beginning of the road, not its end," Mordechai said.

He said he would ask the parliament to suspend the immunity he enjoys as a legislator should prosecutors decide to indict. At the time the allegations surfaced, Mordechai suspended himself from his duties pending the investigation's outcome.

The initial accusations launched a flood of similar claims from women who had worked with Mordechai throughout his career.

Police said they have credible evidence that one woman, reportedly a prospective employee, was assaulted by Mordechai in his home in 1996 during his term as defense minister. They said there is evidence that another woman, reportedly a soldier under Mordechai's command, was assaulted in his home in 1992, while he headed the northern command.

Mordechai, 55, a career officer before entering politics, is currently head of the small Center Party. He ran for prime minister last spring and showed promise in early polls. But on the eve of the elections, when it was clear the vote was split between challenger Barak and then-Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, he pulled out and endorsed Barak, who won easily.

Feminists said the case against Mordechai exposed a male-dominated culture here that has bred tolerance for widespread sexual harassment of women in the workplace. Colette Avital, a lawmaker in Barak's Labor Party, said she has been sexually harassed in the army and in other places of work.

"The norms have changed," she said. "Women are no longer accepting it."

Labor lawmaker Yael Dayan said Mordechai should resign.

Mordechai is only one of a panoply of top Israeli officials embroiled in scandals. Last month, police recommended indicting Netanyahu for corruption and obstruction of justice charges in a bribery and misappropriation scandal.

This month, they recommended closing a file alleging fraud and breach of public trust against President Ezer Weizman, but said they had found evidence of wrongdoing. Barak's campaign financing is under police scrutiny, and the spiritual leader of the ultra-religious Shas party, Rabbi Ovadia Yosef, is being investigated for incitement after comparing a Cabinet minister to Satan, among other epithets.

7 people crushed to death in stampede following gas attack at Portuguese club

By CRISTIANA PEREIRA
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

LISBON, Portugal — Two canisters believed to contain pepper gas were set off inside a crowded Lisbon nightclub Sunday just as the lights were cut, causing a panicked stampede by hundreds of people that left seven dead.

Sixty others were treated at a hospital for bruising and breathing difficulties after the rush to escape the fumes.

No one claimed responsibility for what appeared to be a planned attack. Police opened an investigation.

The attack on the Luanda club came at about 4:30 a.m. local time. As gas billowed across the darkened dance floor, Joaquim Dias, 25, said he felt his eyes watering and his throat burning. He dipped his sweater in his drink and covered his mouth.

"People were running everywhere," he said at a police station. "The dance floor suddenly emptied. There were people on the floor, others were being carried out."

The Institute for Legal Medicine, where the bodies were taken for autopsies, said the victims appeared to have been crushed, according to state television RTP. The autopsy results were due today or Tuesday.

An employee at the club who asked that his name not be used told The Associated Press the canisters were set off inside the club, not thrown in from outside.

Authorities did not immediately specify what sort of gas was used, but police sources speaking on condition of anonymity said it appeared to be pepper gas. Authorities thought the power was deliberately cut.

The club is named after the capital of the African nation of Angola. At least 500 people, mostly Africans, were inside at the time of the attack, witnesses said.

The dead were a 20-year-old Spanish woman, Ester Ramos Lopez of Madrid, and six Angolans between 20 and 25 years old.

Lisbon city councilor Vasco Franco said the club abided by all legal safety measures and was inspected three months ago. Carmo Paiva, a witness, said the club had four emergency exits but everyone bolted for the narrow front entrance.

"Everyone headed for the main door. Some fell and were trampled on by the others," Paiva said.

The nightclub is on a cobbled street in the busy riverside area of Alcantara, where dozens of clubs are located. Police combed the building for clues Sunday and studied tapes from security video cameras. They said they have identified a number of suspects, but no arrests have been made.

Lisbon has a large African population, mostly immigrants from the country's five former African colonies, but racist attacks are infrequent.

Exactly three years ago, 13 people were killed and 13 injured when hooded gunmen burst into a discotheque in the northern Portuguese town of Amarante and set it on fire. Four men were convicted in the attack, which was prompted by rivalry with another club in the rural town.

losing FAITH

Repetitive dialogue thins sharp acting in Norton's 1st directorial effort

By KELLY FURNAS

COURTESY PHOTOS

Edward Norton's directing debut, "Keeping the Faith," is full of charm, wit and brains, but might be the slowest-moving film of the year.

There is a lot of fun to be had at this movie, which tells the story of a rabbi (Ben Stiller) and a priest (Norton) who are best friends and both in love with the same woman (Jenna Elfman).

Despite the obvious possibility of religion jokes, this movie admirably only occasionally makes light of the characters' faiths. It actually handles the topic perfectly — it has plenty of humor, but within the dignified confines of the religious overtones.

The movie also has sharp performances all around. Stiller and Norton are terrifically blended as friends and are actually quite believable as hip spiritualists. Elfman ("Dharma & Greg") does the impossible by shedding her sitcom persona without losing any of her charm. The three actors together have terrific chemistry.

Plus, the film has an intelligent theme throughout. Norton's character must deal with the temptation of sex in light of his vow to the church. Stiller's character must handle the fact he has fallen in love with someone outside of his faith.

So how can a movie with everything going for it still not be worth seeing?

It is unbearably long (2 hours, 25 minutes), and for no reason. The dialogue in the film, although well-scripted, often is repetitive or obvious. The characters are given too much time to speak to each other, which simply results in lines being said over and over.

Pacing in this movie is indeed a big problem. The first half of the movie goes nowhere, and there is so little tension, it makes the plot to that point forgettable.

Once the ball does get rolling, there seems to be little deliberation on the already-mentioned sharp themes. Three weeks go by for the characters to think about it, but then the tension is relieved without any healing process.

The ending is also a bit disillusioning, although it's hard to avoid that when the topic is about a love triangle with all good characters.

There will be a great deal of people who will see this movie and enjoy it greatly — as I did — but chances are most still will take a few glances at their watch periodically throughout the movie. No matter how many great things a movie does, it still shouldn't be recommended if it doesn't begin or finish well.

'Ready to Rumble' lacks originality, believable casting, theme

By KELLY FURNAS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

A movie should only be able to rip off so many things before actually having to make "Lack of Original Thought" the title.

Ironically enough, even the title of "Ready to Rumble" is taken — with permission, of course, from announcer Michael Buffer. However, this movie borrows much more. It takes the characters of "Dumb and Dumber," the theme of "Celtic Pride" and the music from — get this — "American Beauty."

Chances are anyone who goes to see this movie is a wrestling fan. The plot revolves around two wrestling fans (David Arquette and Scott Caan) who watch their favorite wrestler, Jimmy King (Oliver Platt), get swindled out of his championship belt and kicked out of the sport. The two then spend the rest of the movie trying to find the King and restore him to his throne, so to speak.

This film might appeal to wrestling fans, but even they probably will be bored by a lackluster story line. The best elements of the movie are the wrestling scenes that could be seen on pay-per-view. Plus, the stereotyping of wrestling fans as slack-jawed yokels can be unsettling.

Offensive can be funny, but it's seldom wise to target the slew of insults at one group of people — especially when that group probably makes up 95 percent of the audience that will see the movie.

Plus, no fan will be able to accept Platt as a professional wrestler. Platt has done some fine work in his career ("Bulworth"), but this role required a bit more.

Actually, it required a bit less. Platt just isn't proportioned correctly for his character. Add the fact he is standing next to some of the most built individuals on the planet, including wrestler Bill Goldberg, and Platt just looks ridiculous.

For those who couldn't care less about professional wrestling, stay as far away from this movie as possible. Despite some terrific instances of situational humor (such as a van full of nuns singing Van Halen's "Runnin' With the Devil"), this movie for the most part is quite painful to watch.

The plot and dialogue in the film are incredibly boring, and each performance takes the actor's career to a new low.

It's a shame that with all "Ready to Rumble" took from other influences, it failed to come away with a successful product.

That is, if you don't count the soundtrack.

No Doubt's new album covers unfamiliar ground with weak lyrics, whiny vocals

By SARAH McCAFFREY
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

No Doubt's latest release, "Return of Saturn" will please fans who have been waiting patiently for a new dose of Gwen Stefani's vocal mastery.

The album allows Stefani to showcase her vocal talents on some tracks that are lyrically challenged. Corny lyrics such as "like a fresh battery, I'm energized by you" from the song "New" help to drag down the album and take away from the musical strength of Stefani and her band.

Besides using corny lines that any amateur songwriter could come up with, some of the songs on the disc seem to be an outlet for Stefani to complain about her love life and the horrors of being famous.

Songs like "Magic's in the Makeup," "Artificial Sweetener" and "Marry Me" do nothing but detract from the album. The songs never deliver the usual No Doubt punch and leave the listener wondering what happened to the old Gwen they came to love from the "Tragic Kingdom" release.

Many of the songs seem to be Stefani's ponderings and regrets about her own life. Although the listeners might be able to relate to some of the material, the majority just seems to be whiny tirades about how awful it is to be famous and to have a famous boyfriend.

There are a few bright spots to the album, which help balance some of the mediocrity. The two singles that already have been released from the album, "New" and "Ex-girlfriend," stick to the traditional No Doubt formula that made the group such a hit in the beginning. The songs start off slow, draw the listener in and then deliver a one-two punch when the chorus kicks in. The band does a great job of backing up Stefani's vocal prowess on the choruses of these tracks.

A few of the tracks on the album seem out of step with No Doubt's old style. The song "Bathwater" has a catchy up-tempo rhythm but almost sounds like a corny show tune at times.

"Suspension Without Suspense" is a slower song that never delivers the group's traditional pep. Stefani almost seems to be striving for an Alanis Morissette sound on this track.

Overall, the disc fails to deliver what No Doubt fans have been so patiently waiting for. There are a few songs that stick to the formula that brought No Doubt to the top of the alternative charts in the past, but the majority of tracks seem out of place and inconsistent with what the band's followers have come to expect from the group.

Raiders take kicker in 1st round

By DAVE GOLDBERG
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — The Oakland Raiders might not have much else. But they should have the NFL's best kicking game next season.

And certainly the youngest. After pulling the biggest surprise of the first round by choosing kicker Sebastian Janikowski with the 17th overall pick, the Raiders went for a punter in the fifth round Sunday when they took Shane Lechler of Texas A&M, who averaged nearly 47 yards per kick last season.

"This is something we needed to improve on," Coach John Gruden said of his team's kicking game.

So he went out and took two kickers in his first four picks.

Believe it or not, the Raiders aren't the first team to spend relatively high picks on kickers. In 1976, its first year in the NFL, Seattle spent two third-round picks on kickers — punter Rick Engles and place kicker Don Bitterlich.

The other 30 teams spent the second day of this draft improving in more conventional ways.

While most of the sure things went on the first day, a lot of big-time players went on the second day.

Tee Martin, the Tennessee quarterback, went to Pittsburgh late in the fifth round, the 160th player chosen and the fourth quarterback. Two picks later, Minnesota chose Stanford's Troy Walters, who won the Biletnikoff Award as the nation's best wide receiver but who is only 5-foot-6 1/2 and 171 pounds.

Quarterback Joe Hamilton of Georgia Tech, runner-up for the Heisman Trophy, wasn't taken until the seventh and last round, with the 234th overall pick. Hamilton, who is just 5-foot-10, joins Shaun King, the 6-footer who was taken in the second round by the Bucs last year and got them to the NFC title game as a rookie.

The likes of UCLA wide receiver Danny Farmer (to the Steelers); Penn State linebacker Brandon Short (Giants); and Minnesota safety Tyrone Carter (Vikings) went in the fourth round; and Virginia Tech safety Anthony Midget (Falcons); Nebraska cornerback Ralph Brown (Giants); Miami guard Richard Mercier (Baltimore); Miami running back Michael Wiley (Dallas, where he will be tried at wide receiver), and Kentucky tight end James Whalen (Tampa Bay) were chosen in the fifth.

Running back Frank Murphy of K-State went to Chicago in the sixth round, and Philadelphia used the next pick on Minnesota running back Thomas Hamner. Murphy, who has fumbling problems, also has a record of petty crimes going back seven years, when he was arrested for carjacking.

There was a milestone of sorts in the fourth round, when linebacker Isiah Kacyvenski was chosen by Seattle, the highest any player from Harvard had ever been chosen.

One pick of interest came in the sixth round, when Denver chose Utah running back Mike Anderson, a former Marine who will turn 27 in September. But he has history in his favor. Terrell Davis, the league and Super Bowl MVP two years ago was a sixth-round pick in 1995 and Olandis Gary, who replaced Davis last year when he was injured and ran for more than 1,000 yards, was a fourth-rounder a year ago.

Later in the sixth, New England took Michigan quarterback Tom Brady and Washington took Stanford QB Todd Husak late in that round. San Francisco, which took quarterback Giovanni was Lamar Chapman, who was drafted by the Cleveland Browns in the fifth round. Chapman was described by Donahoe as a "twen-er" between a cornerback and a free safety.

Darren Howard celebrates one of his three sacks of Washington quarterback Marques Tuiasosopo in the Culligan Holiday Bowl, where he was named the MVP. Howard was the first Wildcat chosen in this year's NFL Draft, going to the New Orleans Saints with the 33rd pick.

He was taken as the 146th pick overall and was unavailable for comment on Sunday.

The last K-State player selected was often-injured running back Frank Murphy who was selected as the fourth pick in the sixth round, by the Chicago Bears. Murphy, according to Donahoe, is looked on as a project who is intriguing because of his speed and soft hands.

He, too, was unavailable for comment upon his selection on Sunday.

The most positive aspect of the streak is the confidence the team has developed, Clark said.

"We needed a stretch like this to get our heads up and play with confidence," Clark said. "Everybody goes through a stretch like this, and you say 'It's Howard,' but we started this thing with two wins against Oklahoma State.

"We just have to keep building on this and see how long it goes. You never know when the first game of a 10-game winning streak is, and it may have been that win over Oklahoma State. We'll just have to wait and see."

"I don't think K-State is where it should be, and I don't think K-State thinks it is where it should be," Valadez said. "It's a big issue that needs addressed, and it's more important than others that are standing in front of it."

Hall said K-State has started a lot of programs to try to help diversity, and that's a good start.

"Now, it's time to work on those programs and improve them and make them better instead of just leaving them the way they are," she said.

Worcester said Senate not only is more multiculturally diverse, but it also has more representation from different living organizations and campus organizations.

He said he hopes to increase the diversity by appointing a diverse range of students to his cabinet and other SGA positions.

Worcester said he plans to meet with student leaders in multicultural groups, residence halls and other campus organizations throughout his term.

"I want to see what we can do to increase the involvement from those particular areas," he said. "To make it work together."

Klimek said military background or a desire to work with the military also was an important factor in making the final decision.

"We want someone who can intermingle city, university and military functions," he said.

Snead said the new city manager will have to work well with the commission in addition to university and military personnel.

"They're the chief administrative officer of the city," Snead said. "They are responsible for implementing the projects that the commission has set out in legislation and the budget."

"We're charged with the policy decisions, and they are charged with implementing the initiatives. Obviously it's a very focused position that they're in."

With those job requirements in mind, he said the commission was looking for someone who would fit in the community.

"We're looking for chemistry," he said. "We're looking for a fit with our community and the current challenges — really the sense of ability to meet the challenge of being a city manager at this time in Manhattan."

After interviewing the five remaining candidates, Klimek said the city commission narrowed the list to three finalists before reaching a decision for a new city manager Sunday night.

"I will say it was a unanimous decision on who we decided upon," Klimek said. "Once we got down to the three it was a difficult process."

Human remains used to smooth wrinkled skin, generate profits

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

SANTA ANA, Calif. — Donated human remains are processed into medical products that generate hundreds of millions of dollars for U.S. companies, despite laws barring profit from body parts, The Orange County Register reported Sunday.

Although grieving families are told that the donations are a gift of life, the newspaper found that material harvested from the dead fuels an industry that is expected to have $1 billion in revenues by 2003.

"I thought I was donating to a nonprofit. I didn't know I was lining someone's pocket," said Sandra Shadwick, whose brother's remains were given to a Los Angeles tissue bank. "It makes me angry. It makes me appalled. If it's not illegal, it ought to be."

The National Organ Transplant Act of 1984 banned profits from the sale of tissue, but companies and nonprofit tissue banks are allowed to charge reasonable fees to handle and process the parts. The law does not define a reasonable charge.

"The law has never been tested in court. Nobody has ever decided what is selling and what isn't," said Jeanne Mowe, executive director of the American Association of Tissue Banks.

Nonprofit tissue banks might obtain body parts useful for up to 100 patients from a single cadaver. The parts are then sold to companies that make products used by doctors and dentists, and the banks and businesses share revenues.

Survivors urged to donate usually are told about vital organs, such as hearts or kidneys, but most of the products derived from the dead are far from lifesaving.

Cadaver skin may be used to puff up the lips of models, enlarge penises or smooth out wrinkles, the newspaper said.

A single body can provide material that is worth up to $34,000 for nonprofit tissue banks, including skin, tendons, heart valves, veins and corneas, which are then made available to doctors and hospitals for up to $110,000.

With bone taken from the same body, a cadaver can be worth $220,000.

"People who donate have no idea tissue is being processed into products that per gram or per ounce are in the price range of diamonds," said Arthur Caplan, a professor at the University of Pennsylvania's Center for Bioethics.

Lives are enhanced by donations: Tendons help athletes, cadaver skin helps solve bladder problems and corneas help the blind to see, said Michael Jeffries, chief financial officer for Osteotech Inc., a leader in the bone business.

"There is a profit," he said. "It's not an evil thing because the profit is put to good use."

The two largest for-profit tissue companies had $142.3 million in sales last year, and each pays its chief executive more than $460,000 annually, the newspaper said. The four largest nonprofit tissue banks will make $261 million in sales this year, it said.

The number of organ and tissue donors increased 172 percent nationwide over the past five years, according to the American Association of Tissue Banks.

Last fall, Vice President Al Gore announced $5 million in grants to organ and tissue agencies.

"I did not know that the amount of money involved was as large as you have pointed out," Gore told the Register in a recent telephone interview.

Rob Bensman, Interfraternity Council member, speaks with Denny Bassett, Acacia alumni, after the decision was made to readmit the Acacia fraternity Monday evening during a Fraternity Council of Presidents meeting at the Kappa Sigma fraternity house. Acacia was removed from campus May 9, 1999.

Acacia readmittance approved

■ Fraternity Council of Presidents met in closed voting Monday night.

By DANEDRI THOMPSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Fraternity Council of Presidents voted to readmit Acacia fraternity after three Acacia alumni fielded questions from members of the council at its meeting Monday night.

Acacia alumni said the fraternity should be back on campus, but not living in a house, by fall 2001. The following year, fraternity members would move into a house.

"It's another step in giving them a second shot," said Mike Goodpasture, president of the Interfraternity Council. "We don't recognize their charter yet. That doesn't happen until they are recognized by their national (organization). Now it's up to national to do what they said they would do."

Acacia was removed from campus May 9, 1999, after IFC found the fraternity guilty of four hazing violations, three substance-abuse violations and two human rights violations. Under the sanctions, Acacia was to be unaffiliated with the university for five years.

Goodpasture said the reasons behind removing the fraternity have been obscured.

"The reasons we did that had something to do with hazing," he said. "But mainly, there was an extremely weak alumni response."

Rob Bensman, member of IFC, said he knew removing the fraternity was the right thing to do last year but said reinstating the fraternity was the right thing now.

"Again, I say unequivocally we did the right thing by bringing these guys here tonight," he said. "Acacia will be a place you'd want your little brother to be with this alumni support."

Goodpasture said the role the alumni have taken in trying to bring Acacia back to campus proves the alumni are committed to improving K-State.

Bill Riley, Acacia alumni and chairman of the task force to have the fraternity readmitted, said he agreed alumni support had been lacking.

"We had a lot of solid alumni who had not been involved or around the house for a lot of years," he said.

Denny Bassett, Acacia alumnus, said they petitioned IFC and the presidents for readmittance now because waiting five years would weaken their efforts to better the fraternity because they have a lot of alumni involvement now.

"We asked ourselves, 'Would we be better for K-State five years from now or two or three years from now?'" he said. "Our answer was that we'd be greatly weakened by five years of a dead organization."

Bassett said he thought one concern people might have about readmitting the fraternity early was that Acacia members involved in the violations still would be on campus and want to return.

He said that wouldn't be a problem as of now. Acacia members from last year were granted alumni status and haven't been involved in the process to have the fraternity readmitted, he said.

If one of those members wanted to be admitted into the fraternity once it is re-established, Bassett said, that decision would be a decision for IFC or the presidents to make.

"In the event that someone wanted to come back, that would be out of our hands," he said. "If IFC wanted to have something to evaluate that person, that'd be best to ensure that we're not being vindictive to a certain person."

Bassett said that's not a problem right now, because none of those members have expressed interest in returning to the fraternity.

Mike Goodpasture, IFC president, tells the Fraternity Council of Presidents why IFC voted unanimously to readmit Acacia.

"We're kind of dealing with a problem that doesn't exist," he said.

Goodpasture told the presidents before they voted that campus and news media response should not be a factor in their voting.

"The only people we have to please are us," he said. "We cannot make these types of decisions based on what others will think. We have to please ourselves by doing what's right, and the only people who know what's right are you guys."

He said the decision to readmit Acacia was the right one.

"It's not being weak about our decision," he said. "We're not being hypocrites — we're giving a second chance to a fraternity that definitely deserves it."

Weekend drug raids brings total number of suspects to 14

By TANNER EHMKE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Riley County Police Department raised the tally of recent drug arrests to 14 suspects Friday after a number of drug raids continued over the weekend.

Seven people were arrested on a variety of drug charges the afternoon of April 10 after police searched a house at 404 S. 18th St. in Manhattan.

Another search warrant was executed Friday at 2103 Green Ave., Apt. 3, which resulted in the arrest of Adam J. King for possession and intent to distribute cocaine, marijuana, methamphetamine, ecstasy, opium, hashish and acid with an estimated street value in excess of $20,000 and an estimated tax revenue in excess of $70,000.

King also was charged with possession of drug paraphernalia and seven counts of no tax stamp.

A second search warrant was executed the same day at 908 Claflin Road as a result of the ongoing investigation of King's involvement. Phillip D. Everett was charged with possession and intent to distribute methamphetamine, no drug tax stamp and possession of drug paraphernalia. More than $3,200 was taken as evidence while Everett is confined on a $6,000 bond.

Five more were arrested when a fourth search warrant at Richard Lundquist's home at 13400 Tuttle Creek Blvd., was executed Friday night and early Saturday morning.

Lundquist was charged for possession and intent to distribute methamphetamine, codeine and diazepam, with three counts of no Kansas drug tax stamp. He also was charged with possession of cocaine, marijuana, drug paraphernalia, criminal possession of a firearm, and criminal use of weapons. Lundquist's bond was set at $25,000.

Nicole Bush, Glenda Printz, Gary Dorr and Robin Wilcox also were charged with possession of a controlled substance and drug paraphernalia, with each bond set at $1,500. Bush's bond was set at $1,000.

Nine firearms, $1,751 and an estimated $6,630 in street value of controlled substances were seized by the police. The estimated tax revenue was more than $18,500.

Arrowhead tickets to be sold Monday

By NANCY FOSTER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Beginning Monday, K-State students will have the opportunity to purchase football tickets for the Eddie Robinson Classic at Arrowhead Stadium at a discounted student price of $20.

Tickets to see the matchup against the University of Iowa will be available through KATS. They will be sold just as the season football tickets were — by completed hours and through the MarketPlace option. The ordering schedule is posted on KATS now.

Students will be allotted 4,400 seats at the south endzone of the stadium, and the other 32,600 seats will be available to donors, season-ticket holders and the general public.

Donors will have first priority and will be awarded tickets on a point system. One point is awarded for every $500 donation in the past five years and for every season ticket purchased in the past five years.

Students who decide not to purchase tickets with the student discount can purchase them through the Bramlage Coliseum ticket office in increments of $35, $45 and $50.

Max Urlick, K-State athletic director, said about 25,000 tickets have been purchased so far, and they will continue to be sold throughout the summer.

He said students had two options when purchasing tickets — they can purchase them at the regular price and possibly obtain a better seat, or they can purchase them through K-State and get the discounted student price.

The game is a preseason exhibition game and does not count as a part of the 11 regular-season games.

"A game like this every once in a while is good for a program," Urlick said.

McCulloh to take mayor post today

By DANICA COTO
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

City Commissioner Karen McCulloh will be given an added responsibility at the City Commission meeting today.

She will be the new mayor for Manhattan as Commissioner Roger Reitz steps down.

"I think it'll be kind of fun," she said. "It's a challenge, but one that I look forward to."

McCulloh said there won't be a lot of significant change from a Reitz-run commission, but she wants to see more action this year.

The commission has led several task forces, and it's time to implement some of those findings, she said.

"Housing is a major issue because it's connected to so many other activities," she said. "That's probably the one that we need to move on quite quickly."

The main reason for focusing on housing is because adequate housing fosters economic growth, she said.

Transportation is another big issue, and McCulloh said her biggest challenge is finding funds to make these programs move forward.

"We're going to have to get pretty smart and pretty resourceful. Not that we haven't been, so it's going to be difficult," she said. "It'll be a challenge to facilitate these activities in a time of dwindling resources."

One way to attack this problem is to form partnerships and cooperative relationships with other taxing units, she said, such as schools, universities, the private sector and the county.

"There's a lot of duplication of service and activity between the city and the county," she said. "The taxpayers need to stand up, and they need to say 'we need this now,'" she said.

She said her job as mayor will not be hindered by people who disagreed with her last year when she voted to remove a monolith of the Ten Commandments from City Hall.

Petitioners organized a recall election, but McCulloh kept her job as city commissioner.

"I honestly feel that when somebody is called into a controversy like this and is held accountable to what she's done, it will make her put a lot more heart and mind into her decisions," said Don Rose, Manhattan resident who led the petition.

The fear that Manhattan residents will not come to meetings because she is mayor is unfounded, Rose said.

"I won't stop him, he said. "I'm an issue person, and if there was an issue that came up that I thought needed some input on it, I'd be more than happy to make it," he said.

McCulloh said she doesn't think the past will be a problem for her. In fact, it will maybe work in her favor, she said.

State supreme court might hear sex offender appeal

TOPEKA — The Kansas Supreme Court might duck the legality question concerning part of the Kansas Sex Offender Registration Act because the latest appeal is on shaky ground.

The justices heard arguments Monday from the state and the lawyer representing a convicted sex offender.

At the center of debate is whether the Kansas Bureau of Investigation has the authority to post names of registered sex offenders on the Internet.

The law specifies only that the information be available to the public in the sheriff's office — not online.

But Edward Wilkinson's name is not even on the KBI site because the bureau doesn't view his incest conviction as among those listed in state law requiring offenders to register.

However, the Wichita man is registered with Sedgwick County, and attorney Brent Getty worried that the KBI could add Wilkinson to its list at any time. Registrants' names already are available on the sheriff's department's Web site.

Getty also questioned whether the state ignores the rights of convicted offenders.

He said it does not have a separate hearing to determine if a person is a future threat before making someone register as a sex offender.

"The state is punishing him," Getty said.

But some justices were not convinced that Wilkinson's name would appear on the KBI site and questioned whether they should decide this case.

"There's no immediate threat this is going to occur," said Chief Justice Kay McFarland. "Did you possibly pick the wrong horse here to challenge this?"

Debra Peterson, assistant district attorney for Sedgwick County, said the Legislature and the court agreed that sex offenders are likely to repeat their offenses, and that additional hearings are unnecessary.

"The registration follows as a result of what someone has already done," she said.

A decision on the case — if the court decides to act on it — is expected June 2.

Author of 'Primary Colors' releasing new novel today

NEW YORK — His rude transformation from "Anonymous" to Joe Klein helped the author of "Primary Colors" write his next political novel.

"The roots of 'The Running Mate' are partly from my own 10 or 15 minutes on the griddle," said Klein, whose latest book centers on a nasty Senate campaign. "I didn't know how to deal with the pressure, and I regret that I didn't handle it better."

The new novel comes out today.

Klein used the pen name "Anonymous" when he wrote "Primary Colors," a scandalous roman a clef about the 1992 presidential campaign. The central character, a womanizing Southern governor named Jack Stanton, was believed to be based on Bill Clinton.

Published in 1996, "Primary Colors" sold more than a million copies as readers wondered who could have written such a racy, detailed book. With everyone from "Doonesbury" creator Garry Trudeau to White House aide George Stephanopoulos suspected, President Clinton called the book's authorship "the only secret I've seen kept in Washington."

Klein, then a columnist for Newsweek, initially ridiculed allegations he had written the novel but later confessed after a Washington Post reporter found a manuscript with his handwriting. Klein took a leave of absence from Newsweek and resigned his consultant position with CBS News.

At the end of 1996 he joined The New Yorker, where he is a political correspondent.

"The Running Mate," which has a first printing of about 150,000, appears a far less sexy affair. There is no mystery about the author. The model for the main character isn't Clinton but a sympathetic composite of several senators who have served in Vietnam, including Nebraska's Bob Kerrey, Massachusetts' John Kerry and recent presidential candidate John McCain of Arizona.

The main character, Sen. Charlie Martin, also appeared in "Primary Colors." He's a Democrat and Vietnam War veteran who briefly opposes Stanton in the presidential primaries and then endures a vicious campaign for re-election.

"During the Republican convention in 1996, I had a conversation with John McCain," Klein said.

Government laptop stolen. Officials are investigating the disappearance from the State Department two months ago of a laptop computer that contained highly sensitive information.

The department and the FBI are conducting the investigation concerning the laptop, which a State official said was shared by several officials.

After The Washington Post reported on the disappearance Monday, Chairman Benjamin Gilman, R-N.Y., of the House International Relations Committee, said he plans to have hearings next month.

"The missing laptop is the latest in a long string of security failures at the State Department," Gilman said. "It is obvious that the department lacks a professional environment that is sensitive to security concerns."

The Post said the computer vanished from a supposedly secure conference room in the department's Bureau of Intelligence and Research.

The newspaper, quoting a person familiar with the incident, said the missing computer contained code word information, a classification higher than top secret. It also contained intelligence information and plans, the person was quoted as saying.

State Department spokesman James P. Rubin said the protection of classified materials is a top priority of the department.

"The safeguarding of sensitive information is the personal responsibility of every employee in every bureau," he said. "It is critically important to the U.S. national security that our employees take this responsibility seriously and take the necessary steps to protect this information."

Gilman said the Bureau of Intelligence and Research was found by the State Department's inspector general last year to be not in compliance with many department security procedures.

Last December, the department expelled a Russian diplomat, Stanislav Borisovich Gusev, who was accused of gathering information from the department with an eavesdropping device.

An internal department audit, issued in December, found that the department let visitors, contractors and maintenance workers roam the building unescorted.

Gilman also said that in 1998, a man walked into the office of the executive secretary to the secretary of state and removed a sheaf of papers.

The man and the papers never were found, Gilman said. Rubin said Assistant Secretary of State David Carpenter, who heads the diplomatic security office, is leading a review of security issues.

"The review began in March and is expected to be completed shortly," Rubin said.

Commission names Fehr Manhattan city manager

By ANGELA KISTNER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Manhattan mayor Roger Reitz announced the city commissioners' unanimous selection of the new city manager Monday morning.

Ron Fehr, former Manhattan assistant city manager and acting city manager, was selected for the position from the five final candidates that came from a pool of 65 applicants.

"I can't tell you how glad I am to make that announcement," Reitz said. "It didn't come easy. We had excellent, excellent people to deal with."

Reitz said he thinks Manhattan citizens will be pleased with the decision because Fehr is familiar with Manhattan and committed to making an honest and genuine effort to improve Manhattan.

"We feel comfortable with this," Reitz said. "He's not an old shoe. It's just that he's a good guy."

Fehr said he was excited about the opportunity to help lead Manhattan.

"I'm looking forward to working with our various community partners," he said.

Fehr said there were many important issues and goals in the community he wants to work on — one being the Corporate Technology Park.

"It's important that we continue to diversify the business and economic make up in the community," he said.

Another issue Fehr said he would like to work on is affordable housing in Manhattan.

"I want to work on launching initiatives to help in that area," he said.

Fehr, who has been a Manhattan resident for 18 years, said he thought since he was familiar with the community and the people in the community, he had a great opportunity to help Manhattan move forward.

"It helps when you have that relationship already established," he said.

City commissioner Ed Klimek said Fehr's familiarity with the city of Manhattan and the people was not a deciding factor to hire him. He said being familiar with the city and the position can work both ways. It's a strength to have lived in the community and know all of the issues; however, Klimek said it also can be more beneficial to bring someone in from the outside with fresh ideas and new perceptions.

"We weighed both of those factors," he said. "That's one of the things that made the selection process more difficult."

Klimek said one factor in Fehr's favor was his experience as interim city manager about four years ago when he responded well.

"We knew he was a strong person because of that," he said.

Fehr, who is taking the place of former city manager Gary Greer, said he and his family are looking forward to staying in the community.

"We're looking forward to starting our new role," he said. "We think it will be a very smooth transition."

Ron Fehr (right), former Manhattan assistant city manager and acting city manager, is congratulated by a friend after being named Manhattan's new city manager at City Hall on Monday morning. Fehr was one of 65 applicants for the job.

Air Force ROTC cadets learn to adapt to stressful situations at summer camp

By DANICA COTO
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

They have eight minutes to eat a meal, seven hours to sleep and have to march everywhere they go.

They learn to fold their socks three or four different ways and when they are done folding their T-shirts, an officer will measure them to make sure the dimensions are exact.

And at the end of it all, they receive a 708, their report card.

Welcome to summer camp. That is, Air Force ROTC cadet summer camp.

K-State Air Force cadets participate in this camp during the summer before their junior year and acquire basic-training skills.

"They want to test cadets and see how they can handle stressful situations," Technical Sergeant Todd Dies, a non-commissioned officer in charge, said. "Everyone has to work to make it a success. There is no 'I' in this."

An average of 15-25 cadets go each year, and this year they'll go to either Panama City, Fla., or San Antonio, Texas.

They will be required to get up every day at 4 a.m., be ready to run two or three miles by 4:30 a.m., shower and then interact within a structured classroom environment.

"When they come out of camp, they have a totally different aspect of life," Dies said. "They're focused and ready to conquer the world."

It's a four-week course, but those who joined ROTC their junior year are required to do a five-week course to complete general military course requirements.

"When these kids go to bed, they're out like a rock," Dies said. "It's rush, rush."

Jared Hewitt, senior in criminology, volunteered to train cadets so they'll be prepared by this summer.

Hewitt went through the program in July 1998 and said he enjoyed the camaraderie and the confidence he gained.

"Basically you get there and you're put in a completely different environment," he said. "It plays on your nerves. It helps you realize your limits."

There are several reasons people decide to join ROTC and go to this camp. Some want structure in their lives others do it for patriotism, and some think it's cool to wear a uniform, Hewitt said.

Despite stereotypes about the military, the camp has a definite purpose, he said.

"I think it's a necessary thing to prepare a military that can defend the nation. A lot of people forget the purpose of it," Hewitt said. "The only way to defend them is to be highly trained."

There are also explanations for strict rules, such as folding one's clothing to exact measurements, said Chad Johnson, a sophomore in management and information systems, who will be going to the camp this summer.

"I would say it's to discipline yourself and to be organized," he said. "The whole experience probably helps you become a better leader and team player."

However, folding clothes and making beds is not one of Johnson's concerns.

He said he's heard stories about the camaraderie and the friends but also the stress and the demands.

"I heard a story about one guy who bumped into a plant in the cafeteria and an MTI made him apologize to the plant," he said.

Johnson decided to become an Air Force cadet for several reasons.

He was offered a scholarship, and then the Air Force sounded like a good deal, he said.

"They would help pay for school, and I would get leadership training,"

he said.

He said the best part of being in the Air Force and going to camp is meeting new people.

"I expect it to be a stressful environment," he said. "They'll probably yell at me a lot, but I think I can handle that."

At the end of the summer camp, awards are given out — the most outstanding one being the distinguished graduate award.

This one is given to the student who has shown the most leadership and skills.

"He's shown that he can take over right now," Dies said.

But it's not all about awards.

Johnson said after camp he'll have more confidence in himself and his abilities.

Time is running out, but there is still time to apply to work for the Collegian.

SGA takes important step toward diversity

K-State student government often has been criticized for its lack of diversity.

While that lack of diversity has been and continues to be a well-deserved complaint, progress is being made toward achieving a more representative Student Governing Association.

This improvement has been most evident through the election of two senators last month. Black Student Union President Korri Hall and Hispanic American Leadership Organization President Melissa Valadez both were elected to seats in Senate.

While these two certainly do not represent the total of the diversity desired in Senate, the fact that they are the presidents of their respective groups does speak well of the progress. More importantly, it provides a chance to expand that reach for diversity.

Senate, which constantly has sought qualified minority members, now will have representatives from both HALO and BSU who will be able to inform and excite members of their organizations about Senate.

Their election, however, should not be looked on by Senate as the accomplishment of a goal.

Senators should bear in mind that diversity of appearance does not always guarantee diversity of opinion. Background, experience and environment are often more critical to determining opinion than race. Senate should continue to seek the opinions of a wide array of individuals, rather than accepting the few minority members of Senate to speak for all K-State minorities.

Senate has, without a doubt, taken an important step toward becoming a more representative campus organization. With work, it can improve even further.

Without work, it will remain what it traditionally has been: a group of non-minority students determining what is best for all K-State students.

OUR VIEW, an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board, is written after a majority opinion is formed. OUR VIEW is the Collegian's official opinion.

Lafene director thanks supporters for efforts

Editor,
Thanks to members of the 1999-2000 Student Senate, Privilege Fee Committee, Student Health Advisory Committee, the student body, President Jason Heinrich, Vice President Gabe Eckert and the many others for your commitment to the health and welfare of the K-State community.

I am most encouraged by your support and dedication and impressed by your concerns. I also speak for the staff at Lafene Health Center in expressing this appreciation.

We will continue to do our best to provide caring, quality health services and maintain your confidence in us and our work for you.

the path to salvation

Multiple world religions acknowledge Jesus Christ as important spiritual figure, teacher

Jesus Christ is the most talked about person of all time.

Articles about him are everywhere. People are curious about him, and many like to speculate on who Jesus was.

He was on the cover of the March 27 issue of Newsweek, and the feature story was about how the other main religions of the world view him. This intrigued me, so I bought a copy of the magazine to use in a future column.

I can think of no better time to write about Jesus than Easter, the celebration of his death and resurrection.

There are disagreements as to exactly who Jesus was and his role in the spiritual realm, but one common belief is held among these religions: Jesus was a real man.

At the very least, he was an admirable Jew and a teacher, which most Jews are willing to acknowledge. First century Jewish historian Flavius Josephus described Jesus as a "wise man," a "doer of startling deeds" and a "teacher" who was crucified and drew a following called Christians. Non-Christian writers such as Josephus provide proof from a source other than the Bible that Jesus existed.

Muslims believe Jesus was a prophet, like Muhammad, but they do not believe he is the son of God (Allah). They also do not believe Jesus was crucified but ascended into heaven without dying.

Followers of Hinduism believe Jesus attained the highest state of "god consciousness." They believe we all are "sons of god" and we have it within our power to become divine ourselves.

Buddhists believe Jesus was an "enlightened being," similar to the Buddha. A significant difference between Jesus and Buddha is Jesus taught about God, the creator of the universe, whom Buddha and his followers do not believe in. Also, Buddhists strive to achieve "Buddhahood," while Christians aim to model their lives after Jesus, but becoming him is impossible.

Here you have five different religions with five different beliefs.

To say each of them is real and lead to the same place would be unrealistic. For instance, I can make myself believe the print on this page is yellow. I can make this true in my own mind and develop a strong conviction about this. In reality, however, no matter how steadfast I am in this belief, the ink is black.

In the same way, a certain religion can believe its views are true and have absolute determination that they are right, but in the end, there is only one truth. What happens after death is not relative to what you think is going to happen. I can't go to heaven because I believe Christianity to be true, while Buddhists are reincarnated because they believe Buddhism to be true.

There is only one result. Only one religion is right.

I'm not going to write the rest of my column rebuking and picking apart other beliefs that aren't consistent with mine. Rather, I'm going to explain why I believe what I do.

There are a lot of people on this campus who think that I'm either fake or just plain ignorant. I've written several columns on Christianity not because I want to get a rise out of people, but because Jesus is everything to me.

I was raised in the church, so I had a Christian foundation growing up, but when I came to school, I had to decide what was right for myself. I spent three years living a miserable lifestyle.

There is a word that describes sex, drugs and being drunk, which is what my life consisted of at various times throughout my college career. It's called sin.

Sin is turning your back on God and going against what He has commanded. You can say I'm full of it, and not believe in God, sin or any of this, but you've experienced the consequences of sin.

The baggage you carry around, whether it's from various unhealthy dating relationships, or other bad experiences in your life, is a direct result of sin, whether you or someone else committed it.

The guilt, regret and pain that are consequences of our actions are real, and they hurt.

I've experienced this crap in my life before, and I know how miserable I was. What makes me different now than I was then is my renewed relationship with Jesus Christ.

Jesus is real in my life. The reality of Jesus isn't something I just took someone's word for. I have experienced his love and forgiveness, which is a result of his sacrifice on the cross. I am a new creation in Christ, and I have been freed from sin. It's the most awesome thing I ever have experienced.

In a world of false hopes and fakeness, Jesus is the real deal. He was crucified, died a violent death and rose again on a day coming up called Easter. He was perfect, and he did it all for you.

Jesus said, "I am the way, the truth and the life, no one can go to the Father, but through me."

To accept Jesus as lord and savior is simple — reach out to him, and he'll reach right back.

I write what I do for no other reason than to express the freedom I have in Christ. There is no uncertainty about what is going to happen to me after I die, and that is a tremendous release.

We often get wrapped up in our day-to-day choices — such as what major to choose or what to do for the summer.

Don't make the mistake of forsaking the one choice that truly matters — the hope you are placing your eternity on.

Women voters have vast influence over presidential elections

At the risk of adding to what has become a religiously exhausted semester, I am going out on a limb to make a point.

Women, religion and politics are my topics for this week.

After reading a poll conducted by iVillage.com's Election 2000 channel and InterSurvey (a Web-polling organization), I realized this is the time for American women to influence the upcoming election.

More than three-quarters of women in the U. S. electorate said they want a candidate who believes in God.

These women — who defined themselves as religious — were women who attended church every week. They were not necessarily preachers who were consummate preachers of the Bible or extremely active in church activities.

The women who took part in the poll are the women who are moving toward electing Al Gore president.

The poll also showed that Republicans no longer are thought of as the morally fit of the two parties. Democrats almost always were ahead of Republicans on every issue, so the Republicans do not seem to have a lock on the values debate.

Who cares, right? Well, some of you reading this should care.

These same women also support gays and lesbians in the military.

George W. Bush recently spent about 40 minutes with a group of homosexuals whom he and his would-be administration do not support. He said he might allow a homosexual on his administration team, possibly. How much more discriminating can the man be? How much less could I want to see him in the Oval Office?

Although I have not been impressed by Gore at all times during this campaign, he has grown on me as I witness his fight to become leader of the free world.

If Gore is elected, it would not only show a positive upheaval of tradition and signal to America that a new and creatively energetic generation of humans are moving up to every side of this country; it also would be a positive development in women's rights.

It is surprising and exciting to see these types of liberties emerging from the female population of America. Since Gore is not the front runner of the presidential race, it is up to women to change that. It would be a reality check in the questioning of women's power and capabilities in this country.

As college students, we will be making our way into the real world. We will be searching for jobs, getting married, having children and living in a society that is different than when we were born.

The leader of this country and his administrative team, along with Congress, are the ones who are the foundation for everything that runs in the United States. When our soon-to-be independent lives are at stake, we need to focus on who the front runners are and what they base their lives around (or what they do and do not support).

As a woman, I do not want a man running the country who is consistently fraudulent and ridiculous when interviewed.

As a woman, I do not want a man running the country who is in favor of restricting abortion rights.

As a woman, I do not want a man running the country who cannot sit in a room with homosexual people who are just as fit and intelligent as anyone else.

To ignore so many individuals and groups of people just because one does not approve of them is not going to help any women in any part of the world.

So this is the crucial time for women to become involved in electing Gore.

Take part in polls online. Take the initiative to pay attention every once in a while to those boring news programs that feature election coverage (Comedy Central has a hilarious take on the race — at least try that). Take part, as women, and register to vote. The Internet has professional and women's-issue-based Web sites that actually are influential in polls taken for news services.

If our votes can turn this race around, we could influence who gets elected.

November is not far away, and the crunch campaigning is coming up. This is one story that definitely is not going away for a while, so why not become involved?

Women have had a vast opportunity to further advance our rights in front of us.

We just might thank ourselves in the end.

The Collegian's Reader Fourum is an anonymous call-in system that allows readers to voice their opinions on any topic for 20 seconds.

Boss: nice column on Simoneau going first round.

With all of the columnists writing about religion lately, I think it's only fair that I admit that I've been to Hell, and it's Scott City, Kansas.

The weather was fine. The fields were dry. We didn't have our softball game. I ask, why?

It's Sunday. I'm drunk. Thank God for Pizza Shuttle.

Scott Roney, please stop writing on things that you don't know anything about.

I think it's sad that Scott Roney has to use precious Collegian space to promote his ignorance.

I think "Dilbert" should be renamed "Stupid Cartoon."

Hey, Scott Roney. Insecticides haven't been an environmental issue for three years. Global warming has been proved. Pick up the paper and read it.

Hey, Ken. If you're not the one getting hazed, and the people getting hazed know they're going to get hazed, why do you care?

I think Nick Bratkovich should be applauded for his column on the women's crew team this week.

I'm pretty sure a calzone is Italian.

Why don't they make adult shampoo tear free, also?

A calzone is Italian. Try a gyro.

I was just wondering why, on the back page of the Collegian, we're not advertising for the KU school of business.

The Collegian weather forecast: high of 71, low of 54. Current temperature: 47 degrees.

My professor told us that Columbus sailed the ocean blue in '92. But when I checked the records eight years ago, they don't have any records of a Columbus.

I think Scott Roney should go back to writing about religion because, obviously, he knows more about how to save our souls than about how to save our planet.

Hey, we admit it, we're not perfect. But don't call the Fourum and complain because, "Mommy, they got better grades than I did."

Ford Hall president Tammy Osborn, sophomore in political science, grabs a can of whipped cream to defend herself after being attacked Monday night by all 11 residents' assistants who were made up as ice cream sundaes. Ford Hall residents used 60 cans of whipped cream to cream their R.A.

Ford residents create R.A. sundaes

Some laughed and cheered, while others grimaced in disgust Monday night as the residents' assistants of Ford Hall were topped in whipped cream and syrup.

It was called the R.A. Sundae and was the award for the residents who participated in Penny Wars, a competition to see which floor could raise the most money for the March of Dimes.

"You only get one can, so go for it," Tammy Osborn, first-floor president, said to the third-floor residents.

Third floor received last place, and its residents were given one can of whipped cream with which to douse their R.A. Each floor was given a different amount of cans based on how it placed in the Penny Wars competition.

Sixty cans were dispersed among the floors, with first place receiving 10 cans of whipped cream.

The top-three places also received strawberry, chocolate and caramel syrups.

Third-floor R.A. Erin Matyak turned to audience members after being the first decorated and warned them of what was soon to come.

"I only had one can, so you just wait," she said.

Jenny Wockey, first-floor resident, said residents on her floor were motivated to raise the most money knowing they would get to see their R.A. drenched in ice-cream toppings.

"They were ready to do anything to see me do this," Jaime Snitker, first-floor R.A., said.

Wockey said Ford Hall does Penny Wars every year, and each year it finds something different to do to the R.A.s as an award for the participants.

"This is the first time we've had a whipped creaming," Osborn said.

She said the R.A.s were duct-taped to the walls last year, with the winning floor receiving the greatest number of duct-tape rolls.

"This year, we decided to do something different," she said.

Snitker said she had a lot of fun and was surprised by how kind her residents were to her.

"They were a lot nicer than I thought they would be," she said. "It was fun, but really cold."

She said getting covered in toppings wasn't the only reason she had fun.

"It was fun to get the other staff members," she said.

After the residents doused their R.A.s, several members of the staff turned on each other, knocking each other to the ground in the leftovers and squirting each other with what was left in the cans.

"It's quite the interesting experience, being made into a sundae," Snitker said.

IMF, World Bank pledge in meetings to fight AIDS

By MARTIN CRUTSINGER
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — World finance officials closed out the most tumultuous meetings in the history of the International Monetary Fund and World Bank on Monday with renewed pledges to hasten debt relief for poor countries and increase support for fighting the AIDS epidemic.

The Development Committee, which sets policy for the World Bank, also urged the world's rich nations to do more to open their markets to exports from the world's poorest countries. The World Bank committee pledged to work with the IMF to overhaul internal operations to make both institutions more effective in fighting future global financial crises.

The talks were overshadowed by thousands of anti-globalization protesters who failed in efforts to shut down the meetings but succeeded in putting a spotlight on complaints that both institutions have failed in their job of alleviating global poverty.

IMF and World Bank officials, for their part, declared a victory because they were able to avoid the violent confrontations that occurred last fall in Seattle where police used tear gas and rubber bullets to control the streets and a small number of demonstrators looted and vandalized downtown buildings.

"The thing that we wanted more than anything else was to avoid a confrontation particularly because it would send a wrong image as to what we were doing with civil society," World Bank President James Wolfensohn said.

Washington police and federal authorities spent millions of dollars to turn a large area surrounding the White House and the IMF and World Bank headquarters into an armed encampment with hundreds of police stationed behind metal barricades to prevent the demonstrators from disrupting the meetings as they successfully had done in Seattle at the World Trade Organization meetings.

The IMF and World Bank were forced to run shuttle buses from local hotels beginning at 5 a.m. to get their delegates into the meetings ahead of protesters massing on the streets.

Wolfensohn joked that the revised schedule put the meetings on European time, which will be helpful when the two organizations have their fall meetings in September in Prague, a city that has already begun to make plans to deal with thousands of expected demonstrators.

Canadian Finance Minister Paul Martin said the fact that so many demonstrators showed up was not surprising given anxiety generated by change, such as globalization.

The World Bank communique called the worldwide AIDS epidemic, which has already infected 50 million people, "a very serious public health concern" and pledged an intensified effort to provide money for treatment.

K-State golf team earns victory over Mizzou

By DEREK BOSS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

They call it the Cat Fight.

It definitely was that when the K-State and Missouri golf squads met Sunday at the Eagle Noll Golf Club in Hartsburg, Mo.

Heading into the match, K-State head coach Tim Norris said his team was hungry for a victory against Missouri.

"I know our players are looking forward to leaving Tiger Country with a win," Norris said. "In a dual match, second place is last place."

On Sunday, K-State avoided that last-place finish.

The 6,920-yard, par-72 course saw the Wildcats edge the Tigers at the inaugural event with the help of a tiebreaker.

The dual was left undecided after K-State split 16 matches with Mizzou in the 36-hole event, but K-State won the tiebreaker event by totaling its lowest four rounds from the afternoon stanza, where they outshot the Tigers by 20 strokes 299 to 319.

The format for the meet pitted eight Cat golfers against eight Tigers in head-to-head stroke play competition.

Freshman Todd Rodemich led K-State with rounds of 71 and 73 from his No. 7 lineup position to finish with the best total of the event at 144. Norris said the newcomer's performance earned him the fifth and final team spot for the Cats in the April 24-25 Big 12 Championship.

"He's a player we've looked for all season," Norris said Monday. "I think Todd's a player we're counting on, and the type of golf he played yesterday was a display of his talents. It was a good boost of confidence for him."

Rodemich and sophomore Scott McNeely were the only Cats to claim both their matches against the Tigers in the morning and afternoon sessions.

The Cat Fight was tight from the start, with neither team having an advantage larger than two matches. The Tigers started the event by winning four of the first six rounds in the morning to claim an early lead, but K-State rallied.

McNeely and sophomore Bryan Milberger won the last two matches of the early session to knot the score at four, heading into afternoon play.

There, the Cats gained a 5-4 lead on Rodemich's nine-shot defeat of Missouri's Andy Espe.

Although the Tigers would take the next three rounds from the Cats, K-State would finish by winning three of the last four from Mizzou to even the score and win by tiebreaker.

Norris said the Cat Fight is going to be an annual event between the two schools, as the Tigers plan to travel to Colbert Hills next spring.

K-State's win over the Tigers marked the fourth consecutive event where the Cats either have beaten or tied Missouri during the spring.

The victory also ties the season series between the two schools at 3-3-1 heading into the Big 12 Championship at the Prairie Dunes Country Club in Hutchinson, Kan.

Heading into Sunday's Cat Fight, Norris said the event would be a great tune-up for his team heading into the conference tournament, as well as a good opportunity for the entire team.

"I will be looking at the results from this event to determine our No. 5 man at the Big 12," Norris said. "Fielding eight players will give some players who haven't seen much action this spring a chance to compete."

Norris said the Big 12 Championship should be a good experience for the five Cats he will take to the competition, which includes Milberger, McNeely, Rodemich, senior Mark Sears and sophomore Matt Williams.

"It's a tournament you look forward to, not only for the quality in the field, but for the quality in the golf course," Norris said.

Cats excel at track meet

■ Sprinters, throwers help lead way during weekend meet at Missouri.

By MICHAEL NOLL
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State track team had the competition at the Tom Botts Invitational on Saturday in Columbia, Mo., seeing Green.

Freshman sprinter Jason Green won the 100 and 200 meters, and freshman thrower Rebekah Green placed first in the discus and shot put and was named the meet's outstanding female performer.

Jason Green ran a personal best of 21.48 in the 200 meters and chalked up a time of 10.81 in the 100 meters. Rebekah Green threw a personal best 155 feet, 2 inches in the discus and recorded a mark of 49 feet, 6.25 inches in the shot put, her fourth NCAA provisional qualifying mark of the year in that event.

While both athletes grabbed two first-place finishes, the road to those honors took different paths. Rebekah Green has thrown well all season, assistant coach and recruiting coordinator Ron Grigg said.

"Rebekah was one of the best throwers in the country coming out of high school. She was the number-one ranked shot putter in high school," Grigg said. "She has thrown consistently. We expect bigger and better things out of her at the end of the season."

Jason Green, meanwhile, has had to work more to adjust to Division I competition, Grigg said.

"It's really nice to see Jason running well. You have to be patient with freshmen, and his training's becoming better," Grigg said. "I think he could run in the 10.50 range in the 100 meters and in the 21.20s in the 200 meters. If he does that by the end of the season, we'll be really pleased."

The Greens were not the only K-State athletes to experience success this past weekend.

Middle distance runners, junior Korene Hinds and freshman Amy Mortimer continue to live up to preseason expectations, Grigg said.

"They made our recruiting class nationally known. They are two of the best in the country," Grigg said. "They are one and two in the country in the 3,000 meters and in the top 10 in the 1,500 meters."

Both set personal bests and NCAA provisional qualifying times in the 1,500 meters at the Mt. San Antonio Relays in Walnut, Calif., on Saturday and Sunday. Hinds finished in 4:20.49, and Mortimer ran a time of 4:20.55. Mortimer also finished second in the 3,000 meters with a time of 9:13.74.

The field events also were represented well by the Cats. At Mt. Sac, junior Carmen Wright placed third in the long jump with a career-best leap of 19 feet 4.75 inches.

Wright's and Mortimer's high placings are more impressive when they look at who they were competing against. Mt. Sac is considered one of the most competitive and prestigious meets in the country, Grigg said.

At the Botts Invitational, junior Lori Uher finished second in both the shot put (46-0.75) and discus (149-7), and senior Jason Reid posted his third second place finish of the year in the javelin with a throw of 202 feet, 8 inches.

Also at the Botts Invitational, junior Amanda Crouse placed second in the 3,000 meters, and senior Justin Robinson won the long jump with a mark of 23 feet 4.75 inches.

Jonathan Beasley is the Wildcats' No. 1 quarterback as it stands right now, but he must stay solid during the spring practices and spring game to keep Eli Roberson from taking the starting spot. Roberson redshirted last season and will be a force for Beasley to contend with, according to Coach Bill Snyder.

K-State quarterbacks compete for starting position

By MIKE VIETTI
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State senior quarterback Jonathan Beasley heard the cries from fans last season to replace him with highly touted Eli Roberson — while the freshman was redshirted.

As the Wildcats practice in preparation for the Spring Game on April 29, Beasley now must endure the screams again, only this time Roberson's redshirt status won't keep him off the field.

Only solid play from Beasley can.

"Going in, I know it's my team and my spot to lose, so I'm just going to be out there and do what I've done every year and take it a day at a time and just get better," Beasley said.

What fans didn't know last year was that Beasley's injured shoulder kept him from practicing at times during the season and from playing his best football.

"I knew that they didn't know what I was going through, and my teammates knew I was going through with injuries and things like that, but I didn't let that get to me," Beasley said. "I knew it was just something that, if I kept it in the family and worked hard and things like that, that the fans would appreciate what we're doing."

Fans also seem to forget that Beasley's statistics from his junior campaign match up favorably compared to Michael Bishop's numbers from his junior season in 1997.

Beasley last season completed 44.3 percent of his passes for 1,805 yards, while throwing 14 touchdown passes and seven interceptions with his efficiency rating at 134.89.

In 1997, Bishop completed 43.2 percent of his throws for 1,557 yards, while tossing 13 touchdown passes and eight interceptions. His efficiency rating was also lower at 128.48.

K-State head coach Bill Snyder said Beasley is the team's No. 1 quarterback heading into spring practice but also that he expects Beasley to enhance his skills.

"I think his escapability, even though it's far better than people would anticipate, still needs to improve," Snyder said. "Some things in terms of play selection can improve, although he's done a nice job of it, but in certain areas needs to get a little bit better."

Lurking in the shadows is Roberson, along with junior Jeremy Milne, who is listed No. 2 on the depth chart going into spring practice.

Since his arrival last year, Roberson has been touted as the next Michael Bishop after throwing for 4,665 yards and 37 touchdowns and rushing for 2,178 yards and 42 touchdowns at Lee High School in Baytown, Texas, which is near Houston.

Roberson said he doesn't mind the label and that he doesn't feel any added pressure because of it. While Snyder is contrite about the differences between Bishop and Roberson, he said their knowledge of football stems from the same pipeline.

"What I like about Michael and I do a lot of players is that they come up on the sandlots," Snyder said. "He was playing football when he was 5 years old out in the street and out in the parking lot and out in the vacant lot and Eli, I think, is like that, and I think you create a lot of instincts at some positions when you do that and I'd like to think Eli has done that."

"Has he? I don't know yet. We'll get a better picture of that this spring," Snyder said.

Without talking to Snyder, Roberson said the idea of using both quarterbacks for different situations, as several college football teams are now doing, could possibly work at K-State.

"If he was to do that, I think it would be a good idea because Jonathan Beasley is more of a dropback passer, and I'm more dropback, scramble around and try and make a play," Roberson said.

"Whatever works, works."

For certain though, Snyder said he is expecting Roberson to at least push for the starting job.

"It would be my hope that it becomes a very, very competitive battle for the No. 1 spot," Snyder said. "Right now Jonathan Beasley is our No. 1 quarterback. There's no timetable in regards to that. If it becomes very competitive, then it probably will go through the summer and into two-a-days."

Since his days at K-State are limited, Beasley clearly has more to lose than Roberson, but that hasn't stopped the senior from helping his competition. In fact, Roberson said his mere presence has furthered his development.

"It takes a whole lot of pressure of me knowing that he's a senior and any question that I have I can ask him and that he'll teach me what I need to know to make it in this league," Roberson said.

The transition from high school to college football has challenged Roberson more mentally than physically, he said. Not helping matters is that K-State has a fairly large playbook, and its quarterbacks are given the option to change plays at the line of scrimmage. The toughest aspect for Roberson to pick up was translating his game study onto the field.

"You can see something on the board, and then you go out there and they show you the same picture and you're like 'Whoa,'" Roberson said. "It's real different with people moving around on the field cause on the board nobody moves."

Ultimately, one will probably win and one will lose, but Roberson has his eyes fixed on the big picture — even if he ends up as the backup.

"Kinda, I'll be disappointed," Roberson said. "But, hey, I'm just a freshman — I'll be here for a while."

NFL Draft pleases many K-State fans by choosing more Wildcats than Huskers

Sure, the Buffalo Bills didn't pick me up late in the draft as I had expected.

I'll admit, I thought I would have been a better choice with the 251st pick than Deshaun Polk, but I'm not bitter. I really don't care for the colors red and blue anyway.

Despite my initial disappointment, this year's NFL Draft was a real treat for fans of Purple.

No, I'm not referring to the teams that selected K-State players, or the location in the draft that the Wildcats were taken. I'm not even referring to the fact that the five K-State hopefuls were picked up at one point or another over the weekend.

No, the draft was a success because K-State had more players taken by NFL teams than Nebraska did. I know it's petty, but honestly, in the arena of sports rivalry, being petty is important.

It was a small pleasure to watch as five K-State players got taken while those in Husker red only saw three out of their seven potential players spark interest from professional teams.

Poor Huskers. It just breaks my heart. The NFL experts finally are realizing the wealth of talent that is being cultivated here at K-State under one of the nation's best coaching staffs.

Former K-State defensive end Darren Howard was picked up in the second round by the New Orleans Saints, and apparently he is the guy the Saints wanted all along. At 6 feet, 3 inches and 281 pounds, the Saints plan to rely on Howard as the fierce pass rusher that their defense lacked last year.

Despite Howard's demigod status around the Flint Hills, the response among the New Orleans fans was only lukewarm. The rumor mill got cranking when Howard, who was touted as a high to middle first-round lock, fell to the second round. There are questions about Howard's receptiveness to coaching, his inconsistent play, and his supposed tendency to slack off on some plays. Those questions didn't seem to bother New Orlean's coach Jim Haslett, who has said any problems that might plague Howard are issues that easily can be addressed with coaching and veteran leadership.

And as we found out last year, even if Howard plays at half throttle he still can get from any point on the field to the ankles of a quarterback quicker than you can say "Wabash Cannonball."

Although much of the draft-day focus was on Peter Warrick's history of theft, the only steal over the weekend was Frank Murphy going late in the draft to the Chicago Bears. Some of the Chi-town fans have expressed concern over Murphy's checkered past, but I'll be honest, if it was the sixth or seventh round, I would draft Charles Manson if he could run a 4.2 40-yard dash and measure a 42-inch vertical leap. The Chicago staff obviously knew what many K-State fans have known for months: Murphy's physical abilities are too darn amazing to overlook because of some previous run-ins with the law. The only real concerns about Murphy are whether he can remain healthy, and if he can get over his trouble with putting the ball on the turf. If he can tackle those problems, he will make the Chicago staff look like Issac Newton and friends.

For many, K-State offensive tackle Damien McIntosh was a surprise to go in the third round. Most draft experts had McIntosh going in later rounds. Apparently, McIntosh's 6 foot, 3 inch 325-pound frame showed the Chargers something they liked. And it probably was the same thing that made McIntosh a threat at K-State: he is huge but nimble. Watching McIntosh in action is like seeing a Mack truck do a pirouette: power and finesse all rolled in to one.

The word on the street is that McIntosh will see limited playing time next year as the Chargers groom him to become the replacement for John Jackson, a 13-year veteran who has toyed with the idea of retirement. My suggestion is that if the Chargers don't plan on using McIntosh much on the field next year, they could use him to beat the hell out of crybaby quarterback Ryan Leaf. Damien's selection in the third round will prove to be a much wiser choice than taking Leaf with the second choice overall just two short years ago.

Lamar Chapman is a question mark for the Cleveland Browns. No one knows exactly where to put Chap. His size makes him a bit small at safety, the position he played while under Bill Snyder, but he isn't a textbook cornerback, either. The Browns don't have any huge holes in their secondary, so the assumption is that Chap will see limited playing time unless he can show the coaching staff something special during the summer.

Sure, it was a petty pleasure to watch Nebraska players get overlooked while the boys in Purple had a great showing. But it will be even more pleasurable to watch the Huskers flounder next year during their visit to Jack Hartman Field. They might have been sad this weekend when only a few of their players got mentioned, but they will be even more disappointed next year when they are wishing they could have those three players back.

Health QUESTION

By: Carol Kennedy

Director of health education and promotion at Lafene Health Center

Reasons to visit Lafene before graduation:

- A:
- 1) Health care as a "non-student" never will be as cost effective as student health care.
 - 2) Get a well-women exam to ensure health status, or receive treatment for any health problems before leaving campus (New graduates might not be covered by employment health insurance for several weeks or months, depending on when employment or health insurance coverage begins).
 - 3) Fill your prescriptions at a reduced rate. It is recommended that you get several months supply, in case health care is not accessible for several months.
 - 4) Give your forwarding address to the business office.
 - 5) Provide your new physician's address to have your medical records forwarded.
 - 6) Be sure you have paid your health care bills to avoid delay in receiving your transcripts.

The class is offered twice a week for 30 minutes. INSET: Elisa Harry, senior in kinesiology, leads the class in a warmup jog around the gym before starting the class. New Rec class challenges students with high-intensity training Burning fat tissue is something that can be done in a half hour.

A high-intensity training class is offered at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex from 8:05 to 8:35 p.m. Tuesday and Thursday.

Tamara Mann, instructor of the class and senior in public relations, said high-intensity exercise is basically just full-effort exercise.

"High intensity just means pushing yourself as hard as you can, which is different than low intensity types of exercise such as walking," Mann said.

Mann said the reason high-intensity exercise burns the most fat is because it speeds up your metabolism and keeps it going after you've worked out.

"This type of exercise burns a greater number of calories," Mann said. "More calories burned equals more fat loss."

The high-intensity training class is an eight-week course that progresses in intervals each week.

"The first week starts off with four intervals, so people in the class do four jogs and four sprints," Mann said. "By the eighth week, they are up to 15 jogs and 15 sprints."

Mann said the class starts with a warm-up that consists of stretching and a short jog. Once everyone is warmed up, they begin the intense jogging and sprinting.

"It's a great way to work out, and you don't have to be very coordinated to do it," Mann said.

Mann said she likes teaching the class because she enjoys motivating the students to give it their all.

"I think people are more serious about it than other aerobics classes because it's a shortened program, and it's more intense," she said. "It's a quick, easy way to get exercise that people should take advantage of."

Nicole Dautel, another instructor of the class and senior in kinesiology, said the class has become popular this semester.

"Before spring break, there were only a few people in the class," Dautel said. "We decided to make fliers and brochures explaining the class, and hung them up all over the Rec Complex."

Dautel said after their advertising effort, the class got so big that they had to move it to the old gym in the Rec Complex.

"Now there are about 40 guys and 20 girls in the class," she said.

Dautel said she likes the fact that a large number of males are taking advantage of the class.

"In a typical aerobics class, you don't see a lot of men," she said. "In this class, there are more men than women. I'm glad to see them here and having fun while exercising."

Regina Munoz, sophomore in elementary education, said she saw the informational fliers and decided to join the class.

"I like a challenge when exercising, and none of the classes I had taken before were challenging me, so I wouldn't go back," Munoz said. "So when I saw the fliers explaining the high intensity class, I knew that was a class I would stick with."

Munoz said she recommends the class to people who enjoy running and cardiovascular exercise.

"It's a really high-pulse class. It gets your pulse rate up pretty high," she said.

Dautel said after high-intensity exercise, people are supposed to feel totally fatigued.

Alcoholism not synonymous with college life

By RAEGAN TONEY
KANSAI STATE COLLEGE

There is a myth that alcoholism is associated with college students.

"I would say that the percentage of students that are classifiable alcoholics is very, very low," said Bill Arck, director of Alcohol and Other Drug Education service at University Counseling Services in Lafene Health Center. "I'm a big believer in Project Wellness. People have episodes when they drink excessively, but they learn from their bad experience."

Arck said he thinks alcoholism is a hard disease to diagnose. He said the ability to diagnose alcoholism is best decided by a professional, but even then it is hard to diagnose.

Sherry Benton, psychologist and director of training at Lafene, said there are a few warning signs a person can watch for if they are afraid a loved one has a drinking problem.

"When someone begins to have repeated problems as a result of alcohol, that is a good indicator," Benton said. "Also, when alcohol becomes more important than the social aspect and when people begin to arrange social life around drinking and to accommodate their drinking."

Benton also said alcoholism is hard to detect. She said with some people, it just could be a phase they will eventually outgrow. For others, she said, it could be a serious problem. She said it usually takes an extensive evaluation to determine if the person has a long-term problem.

Alcohol poisoning is another big worry in college communities. Arck said he thinks people often make a bigger issue out of the few cases that occur.

"There are people who drink to excess and need medical attention," Arck said. "But in the end, the numbers are pretty low."

Arck said people's response to the amount of alcohol they can handle differs. Weight and experience plays a big part in how the individual is affected.

"Alcohol can affect women at a different rate than men," said Carol Kennedy, director of health education at Lafene. "Weight is a factor, and women have less water in their bodies than men."

Arck said what three drinks would do to a woman, it would take five to do to a man. The rate of absorption of alcohol into the bloodstream also is affected by how much food a person has had to eat, and carbonated beverages also increase the rate of absorption.

Arck said that if someone is thought to have alcohol poisoning, there are a few things that can be done to determine if the person needs medical attention. He said to first check the person's pulse and breathing and make sure they are laying on their side or stomach. The person should have about eight breaths per minute. He also said a person can do a stimulus response on the victim. On males, make a fist and rub the knuckles on the center of the sternum. If he responds, then he probably will be fine, but continue to check on him. If there is no response, get help immediately.

For a female, Arck said to use your fingernail and press on the victim's fingernail right above the cuticle. Once again, if she doesn't respond at all, seek medical attention.

Arck said individual differences are large factors on how alcohol will affect the individual person. He also said most people already have their drinking habits established when they come to K-State and know how much they can or cannot handle.

"Most people find out how much they can have by personal experience," Arck said. "Personal experience is a pretty good teacher."

Week of ceremonies celebrate progress on Union renovation

By JOSS BRIGGS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Dodging construction equipment is not the only activity that will be taking place in the K-State Student Union this week.

Demonstrations and give-a-ways are scheduled to celebrate progress on the $11.5 million renovation project.

Officials from the Union and Manhattan Chamber of Commerce gathered Monday at the entrance to the refurbished K-State Union Bookstore for a ribbon cutting ceremony to kick off the week.

Jeremy Lutz, Union Governing Board president, used ceremonial two-foot-long scissors to cut the ribbon.

He said the renovation is a much needed step into the new millennium for K-State.

"It's not only very exciting for students but for faculty and administration as a whole," Lutz said. "We've been looking at this renovation project for a number of years and are finally actually seeing results."

Carrie Mitchell helps manage the 30,000 square foot bookstore. She said the renovations have made a difference in business.

"People come in to see what it looks like because it's vastly different than what it used to be," Mitchell said. "Then, because of the way it's merchandised, they stop and buy."

Mitchell said the bookstore's variety and types of merchandise has greatly expanded, along with an increase in the size of the bookstore.

Jeremy Lutz, Union Governing Board president, cuts a ribbon to re-open the K-State Student Union Bookstore Monday morning. Other bookstore and Union officials were present for the ceremony.

MIKE SHEPHERD/
COLLEGIAN

"It's more of an appealing atmosphere," Mitchell said. "We've brought in a lot more clothing and gifts. We've got several different lines, including Nike, GEAR Sport and a lot more vendors."

The goal was to provide a full service store, not just one where students come in at the beginning of the semester and buy their textbooks, Mitchell said.

"Students can come in and pick up just about anything now," Mitchell said. "The whole Union has become more diversified and full service."

Business increased greatly since Feb. 29, when the bookstore moved back into its renovated space on the Union's first floor.

"We had a fantastic day for selling clothing during Open House," Mitchell said. "We've gotten much more into fashion apparel, and it's quite popular."

Students also seem to appreciate the renovation.

"I think it's great," Pete Speer, sophomore in engineering, said. "I think they are trying to modernize everything and move into the future, and they're doing a great job."

Special activities run all week at the Union.

With every purchase from the bookstore, Cats' Den or Copy Center, customers have a chance to win a $100 K-State Student Union Gift Card and free give-a-ways.

The Horticulture Club will demonstrate transplants and give away free plants from 10 a.m. to 3:30 p.m. today.

Muslim rebels from Philippines threaten violence

By OLIVER TEVES
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

MANILA, Philippines — In a southern Philippine province, a Muslim rebel group threatened to execute Americans on Monday unless the U.S. releases convicted terrorists, including the mastermind of the 1993 World Trade Center bombing.

The group also says it will release 29 Filipino hostages it holds — but only if all Christian residents of the province are forbidden from displaying crosses in public.

In another province, more than 100,000 villagers flee their homes to escape clashes between a second Muslim rebel group and government troops that have killed more than 300 people in the past month.

Four years after a peace treaty raised hopes of an end to the Philippines' decades-old Muslim secessionist rebellion, peace in the country's impoverished southern Mindanao region appears increasingly elusive.

The number of casualties and evacuees in the past month's fighting in Lanao del Norte province rate on the scale of a large-scale disaster, surpassing even the 68,000 people who were forced to flee from the eruption of Mayon volcano in February.

The clashes are the most serious since the government and the secessionist Moro Islamic Liberation Front began talks in 1997. They serve as an indication of the difficulties in finding a solution to the struggle for Muslim self-rule.

Over the years, the insurgency has killed more than 120,000 people and stunted economic growth in Mindanao, one of the country's most resource-rich regions and home to its Muslim minority.

All seats are reserved, and the game begins at 1 p.m. Aug. 26, five days after fall classes begin. A portion of all proceeds received will go toward the Eddie Robinson Foundation.

Carol Adolph, athletic ticket manager, said if students want to sit in groups, they must come to Bramlage together to pick up their tickets. One person may have up to four student IDs for the pick-up.

The University Cashier's Office will bill tickets to the students' permanent addresses on May 15, and all tickets need to be paid to the Cashier's Office by June 14.

Adolph said married couples who purchase tickets for their spouses need to provide proof of marriage and pay for the tickets at the time of pick up.

The student discounted tickets will be available through May 5.

"It might even be a positive thing, because it will force us to discuss whether or not we have a sense of city and community and the way we perceive it," she said.

Reitz said he agreed, and that he'll be supporting her along with her friends.

Meanwhile, he said he'll be adjusting to a new life.

"It will be a real change in the way I kind of programmed myself," he said. "It's nothing I can't live with. I don't have a hankering for continuing at this pace."

Reitz will be a city commissioner for one more year, but he said he hasn't decided if he'll run again.

Meanwhile, he'll be working on child-care issues and on renovating the depot, something he said will take some time.

There will be some small differences once McCulloch occupies his position, he said.

"She may be more innovative and hands-on with the city manager," he said. "... I intend to support her wholeheartedly."

Panels to examine Army's high turnover rate

By PAULINE JELINEK
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Two top-level panels will study why so many officers are leaving the Army and recommend what should be done to keep them in, officials announced Monday.

The panels will begin in mid-May and report three months later on any problems with how the Army trains and develops leaders from within its ranks.

Retaining officers has been getting more difficult during the past several years, and in recent years the retention problem has become more acute for junior officers, particularly captains.

For example, Lt. Col. Russ Oaks, an Army spokesman, said 64 percent of the force's captains left in 1988, when the service was paying officers to get out as the Cold War neared an end and the Army was reducing its ranks. That number has grown to more than 10 percent in each of the last three years.

Officials already have begun collecting data for the panels, including some "very rank, very raw, very right-between-the-eyes comments" from officers on midcareer postings at the Command and General Staff College in Fort Leavenworth, Kan., said Lt. Col. Ben Santos, an installation spokesman.

About 1,000 officers discussed the problem last month in 64 faculty-led discussions at the college. They said they mistrusted senior leaders; didn't like the shift to peace-keeping, humanitarian and other missions; preferred civilian jobs in the expanding economy; had spouses unhappy with the long absences and frequent moves of military life. The groups, mostly majors with lieutenant colonels, were asked a range of questions, including what might be making so many officers leave. The idea for the panel came up in February, the discussions were in March, and then students were asked to bring back comments from fellow students as well, Santos said.

What made their comments so troubling, he said, is that "they weren't unsolicited, a bunch of officers sitting around and whining about the Army."

Other officials who declined to be identified said some of the comments were so negative and startling that 16 of the 64 group summaries, which were meant only for internal panel use, have made their way into e-mails that have been bouncing around the military for about a week.

"We have made no conclusions. We have to look at all our information, both comments that were collected here and other surveys that we can gather," Santos said by telephone from Kansas.

Formed on orders from Army Secretary Louis Caldera and Gen. Eric K. Shinseki, the chief of staff, one panel will review leadership, the other training.

Students who came up with the comments in March are taking a seven-week course beginning this week in which they will analyze the comments and forward recommendations to the panel on leadership, Santos said.

LOOKING FOR A BRIGHT FUTURE?

CONSIDER A UNIVERSITY OF KANSAS MBA.

Now is the time to plan for next fall. Here are five of 25 reasons to consider a KU MBA:

- #6. It is designed for students with undergraduate degrees in liberal arts, engineering, journalism, computer science, and other nonbusiness fields.
- #9. The median starting salary for 1999 KU MBA grads was $56,000.
- #13. College algebra is the only math prerequisite.
- #20. You can choose study-abroad programs including Italy, France, and Mexico.
- #25. The career path for KU MBA's is wide open. Choose private industry, the public sector, or entrepreneurship.

K-STATE'S BEST MALE ATHLETE: Mark Simoneau

When it comes to elite linebackers in K-State football history, Mark Simoneau is sure to be found near the top of the list.

Simoneau was chosen as K-State's male athlete of the year.

"It feels great," Simoneau said. "Obviously, when you have the students — the team's base fans — appreciating what you do, it makes me feel really good."

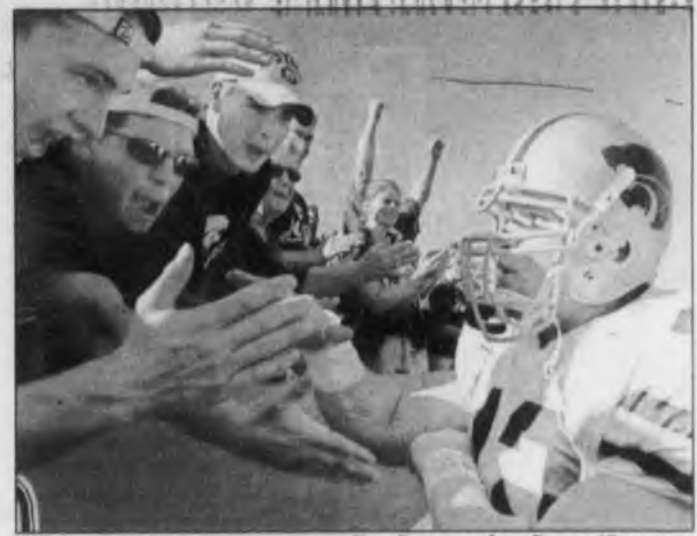

The senior, an Associated Press first-team All-America selection, was the runner-up for the Butkus Award, given to the nation's top linebacker.

In addition, Simoneau is only the second player in K-State football history to be selected as three-time team captain.

Last year, he led the Wildcat defense in tackles for the second consecutive season with 91, 66 unassisted and 17 for a loss, while adding 6.5 sacks and two interceptions in his senior campaign.

The Smith Center, Kan., native set an individual game-high for K-State in 1999 with 16 tackles against Nebraska in Lincoln, tying a career high. He also was named Big 12 Defensive Player of the Week on three occasions after wins against Texas, Kansas and Colorado.

At the season's end, Simoneau received a variety of acclaim for his college career.

K-State fans congratulate linebacker Mark Simoneau after the Wildcats' 35-28 victory over Iowa State on Sept. 25, 1999 in Ames, Iowa.

He finished third on K-State's tackle chart behind Gary Spani (1974-77) and Brooks Barta (1989-92) with 400 career tackles, in addition to holding the Wildcat freshman record with 111 tackles in 1996 en route to Big 12 Freshman of the Year honors.

He was a unanimous 1999 AP All-Big 12 first-team selection, while also receiving first-team conference honors from The Kansas City Star, Austin-American Statesman, Dallas Morning News and Football News.

Nationally, in addition to being named AP first-team All-American, Simoneau was a first-team selection by Walter Camp, The Sporting News and the Football Writers Association of America.

Junior linebacker Ben Leber said he thinks Simoneau is more than deserving to be selected as this year's male athlete of the year.

"I think he's very deserving of that role," Leber said. "He's a natural leader for a team that's a top-five or top-10 team in the nation in college football. So, for him to be the leader on top of this whole program, I can't think of anybody else better for an award like that."

K-STATE'S BEST FEMALE ATHLETE: Nicky Ramage

Unabashed attention should be nothing new for senior Nicky Ramage, the Reader's Choice female athlete of the year for the second straight year.

In the past two seasons, the Big 12 Conference honorable mention forward drew plenty of attention from opposing teams for her athleticism, ability to find the open spot under the basket and unrelenting defense.

In her four years at K-State, Ramage scored 1,096 points, grabbed 562 rebounds and blocked 62 shots.

In 23 of K-State's 30 games this season, Ramage posted double digits in the point column. Not bad for a player who out of high school was considered a "project."

Throughout her college career, Ramage, a Little River, Kan., native, has collected several awards.

This year, she was named as a member of the New Dodge All-American Farm Team. After averaging 14.5 points and 5 rebounds in the Cancun Tournament, she was named to the All-Tournament Team.

Armed with these impressive stats and two Reader's Choice awards, Ramage has earned the right to do a little bragging about her accomplishments.

However, in her modest form, Ramage chose to thank the fans instead.

"Throughout my four years at K-State, I haven't seen anybody as loyal as the fans at K-State, especially the group that sits behind our bench," Ramage said.

BEST PLACE TO GET A MICROBREW: Little Apple Brewery Co.

There's no beating the Little Apple Brewery Co.'s microbrews, according to Collegian readers.

Nearly every bartender can speak about the brewing process, and a lot of people ask about it, assistant manager Keith Morice said.

"The main difference from conventional beer is that we let the ingredients settle and skim the beer of the top," Morice said. "Most breweries filter the sediment from the beer."

The Little Apple Brewery caters to a strong customer base of microbrew drinkers assembled during the bar's five years of existence.

"We even have a beer drinkers' hall of fame and a beer drinker of the year award," Morice said.

"It's actually quite competitive. They have to submit an application with their best beer story or joke."

Microbrew drinkers form a close-knit group, Morice said.

"We're family here. Sometimes we'll do things outside with the drinkers," Morice said. "One time a few of them came over and helped me work on my house, and I've helped one or two on lawn work."

Morice said Wildcat Wheat is by far the favorite beer among patrons.

"I think that's because of its light color and the name appeal, especially on game day," he said.

BEST MOVIE OF THE YEAR: 'The Sixth Sense'

A boy who sees dead people won Collegian reader's votes.

"The Sixth Sense," a psychothriller in which eight-year-old Cole Sear, played by Haley Joel Osment, overcomes a dark secret, was declared the best movie of the year.

Cole divulges his secret to only one other person, Dr. Malcolm Crowe, played by Bruce Willis. Crowe is driven to help Cole overcome his fears, but after learning what they are, he doesn't know if he can help.

Nominated for several Oscar Awards, "The Sixth Sense" takes the viewer into the supernatural world of a grade school boy.

After a long run in theaters, the movie was just released on video. The Westloop 6 Theatres also is showing the picture until April 20.

"It's our most popular movie right now by far," manager Jamie Pride said.

Two students walk out of the lobby of Hale Library last semester.

FAVORITE STUDY SPOT: Hale Library

Whether it is a group project, a big test or a reading assignment, Hale Library was voted the best place to study.

Jennifer Beard, sophomore in anthropology and pre-nursing and a student intern in the Circulation Department, said people study at Hale because it provides a quiet atmosphere.

Since the library's renovations there are increased areas in which to study, more tables, study coves and coaches.

"It provides a variety of atmospheres — the second floor is more a friendly atmosphere perfect for group work, while the third and fourth floor are for hard core studying," said Kim Peschka, senior in political science and marketing and a student intern in the social sciences/humanities reference area.

Peschka said she likes to study in the Cathedral Room.

"I like to be able to dump my stuff out on the table and be able to spread out," she said.

BEST GIFT WHEN HE/SHE IS MAD AT YOU: Flowers

On any occasion that feelings are hurt and a relationship needs mending, the best way K-State students apologize is with flowers.

Karen Medlin, owner of Westloop Floral for 19 years, said a lot of flowers are given out in the spring.

"It's funny," Medlin said. "After spring break or winter break, a lot of flowers are given out."

After the breaks, people want to tell their loved ones they missed them, Medlin said.

"Guys will come into the store and will talk and say that they had a fight or that they stayed out too late," Medlin said. They often ask if flowers are a good thing to buy, Medlin said. She said she reassures them that everyone likes to receive flowers.

BEST PLACE TO TAN: Sun Essentials

As the warm weather begins and the spring break tan fades, college students head to Sun Essentials.

"I think that Sun Essentials is a great place to tan, we have tanning by the minute and have a variety of beds," said Liza Gutierrez, junior in business administration and employee at Sun Essentials.

Kelly Whaley, co-owner of Sun Essentials, said the business has a great location. It is near Wal-Mart, not a crowded location such as Aggieville.

BEST THING ABOUT K-STATE: Friendly People

K-State students are known for being friendly, and the friendly people are what students enjoy most about the university.

"The friendly atmosphere at K-State is a tradition," Dean of Student Life Pat Bosco said. "It was 30 years ago when I came here as a prospective out-of-state student."

"There are so many Kansas high school students attending K-State," he said. "They know each other from debate, athletics and FFA, so they walk with their heads up because they know they will recognize people — they may not remember their names — but they know that they will see a familiar face."

FAVORITE MIXED DRINK: Bourbon and Coke

K-State students enjoy drinking bourbon and Coke.

Lori Anselmo, junior in social science and a bartender at Lucky BrewGrille, said one in every five drinks is a bourbon and Coke on an average night.

"An average student usually has two or three," Anselmo said.

Julie Ellsworth, junior in social science and bartender, said that bourbon and Coke is popular and on a busy night, two in five students will order one.

BEST BREAKFAST: Bob's Diner

The new breakfast competition of Country Kitchen could not beat Bob's Diner.

A tradition among K-State partiers, Bob's Diner offers the best of the best in breakfast food for the late-night crowd.

The diner is open 24 hours, resulting in large after-hour crowds.

Mary King, head waitress at Bob's Diner, said their breakfasts are popular among the bar crowd.

"We certainly get a lot of K-State students in when the bars close," King said. "We have the Big Country going for them."

The Big Country is probably the most popular breakfast item, King said. It consists of chicken fried steak, two eggs, hash browns and biscuits and gravy.

Bob's also has great deals on regular breakfasts that are a lot cheaper than some of their competition, King said.

"We also offer breakfast deals from $1.99 to $3.99 every morning," King said. "We have much bigger plates for a lot less money."

King said the atmosphere and the service of Bob's Diner is one thing that attracts K-State students.

"We have a fun atmosphere here,"

King said. "We are not stuffy like other places, and we get the food out to you in about 5 minutes."

BEST LUNCH BARGAIN: Union Taco Bell

Available to students in the K-State Student Union and on Claflin Road, Taco Bell provides the best lunchtime deals for students on the go.

Taco Bell manager Binh Hoang said one quality that sets Taco Bell aside is that they have one of the best-value meals in town.

"We are cheap," Hoang said. "Basically we have items cheaper than other fast-food places."

Hoang said Taco Bell has 69-cent tacos, and that is one of the main attractions.

"No one else that I know of has 69-cent tacos," Hoang said. "I know that we are cheaper than Taco Grande."

Michelle Rodriguez, freshman in open-option, said she got hooked on Taco Bell in high school.

"We had an open lunch at my school, so we went to Taco Bell because it was cheap, easy and fast," Rodriguez said.

Rodriguez said Taco Bell now is one of her favorite fast-food places.

K-STATE'S MOST HATED RIVAL: Nebraska

Nebraska wins again.
Last year, the hatred came because we beat them, this year, because we did not.

Nebraska has long since been the arch-enemy of the K-State football team, and ever since the devastating loss to the Cornhuskers earlier this year, the rivalry has become even stronger.

Luke Pearse, junior in management information systems, said he is open-minded when it comes to the rivalry between K-State and Nebraska.

"I was born in Nebraska, so naturally I grew up a Husker fan," Pearse said.

Now that he is a K-State student, Pearse said he is able to appreciate both sides of the spectrum.

"When we played Nebraska last year, I did cheer for them," Pearse said. "But it was a kind of cool to see how excited all the K-State fans got."

Pearse said that in his observation, the rivalry between the two schools is so intense because of the closeness of the two schools.

"It just gets more intense every year," Pearse said. "It has built up so great over the years because K-State and Nebraska are such competition for each other."

Pearse said even though he will always be a Nebraska fan, he has come to have an appreciation for the rivalry between the two schools.

"It is healthy for us to have a rival like that," Pearse said. "It makes the games a lot of fun."

FAVORITE PLACE TO WATCH A BALLGAME: KSU Stadium

For some, the tailgating is the best part of the the K-State football experience, but for others, the thrill of the game and the ability to have fun with so many people is the main rush.

With the renovations completed, KSU Stadium is the favorite place for K-State students to watch a ball game.

Jessica Johnson, freshman in mass communications, said she attended all of the home football games last season and in doing so became a Wildcat fan.

"I am from Colorado, so I was never a Wildcat football fan before," Johnson said. "The whole experience of the stadium and the people at the game made it fun for me."

Johnson said she tailgated a few times before games, but the overall effect of the stadium got her excited before each game.

"I really was impressed by how everyone got so involved," Johnson said.

Although she said her general-admission seating was not the best, she said she has had nothing but fun and good experiences at K-State football games.

"I love going to the games now," Johnson said. "I had never experienced football games with so much intensity and with so many people getting involved."

BEST PLACE TO DANCE: Lucky BrewGrille

Observing the crowds that gather on the weekends at Lucky BrewGrille, one can assume it has something great to offer.

The bar won the award for best place to dance.

Bob Leetch, owner of Lucky's, said many students like to dance at his bar because it sets the trend for the music scene in Aggieville.

"We have really tried to stay current on the mix of music we play," Leetch said. "We try to stay ahead of all the other bars in Aggieville."

Leetch said Lucky's plays techno music on the weekends, which seems to be popular with the crowds.

Leetch said the dance scene is not the only reason students are attracted to Lucky's.

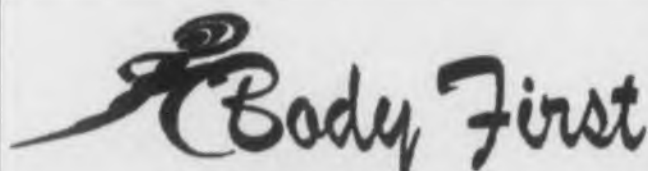

"We offer some innovative drink specials," Leetch said.

Keeping the trend going and staying on top of the Aggieville scene is the most important thing for Lucky's, though.

"We do feature bands on the patio during the summer sometimes," Leetch said.

"But most of our patrons like to dance, and we want to keep them happy."

Pillsbury Crossing attracts many Manhattan couples.

MOST ROMANTIC SPOT IN MANHATTAN: Pillsbury Crossing

Go south from Manhattan on Kansas Highway 177, turn east at Bayer Construction and travel six miles on paved and dirt roads that look like scenes from "The Dukes of Hazzard," and find one of Manhattan's little-known wonders.

The Pillsbury Crossing Wildlife Area, a small nature area centered on a natural shallow creek crossing, was voted most romantic spot.

A small, picturesque nature area with an easily crossed creek and a nearby waterfall away from the lights of the Little Apple makes for a great place to be alone with someone special.

Originally settled by J.H. Pillsbury in 1854 and donated to the Kansas Department of Wildlife and Parks by Dr. and Mrs. E. J. Frick in 1967, the creek crossing is famous not only for the rock crossing but also because it is a site where spotted bass live naturally.

BEST BURGER: Vista

Best beef, best employees, best methods.

That's what the owner of Vista Hamburgers said about his food and why the readers of the Collegian voted the Vistaburger as the best hamburger in Manhattan.

"The best hamburger starts with the best beef," said Brad Streeter, owner of Vista Hamburgers. "We also have excellent employees that prepare them and a few trade secrets in there, too."

Streeter said Vista uses the same process it has been using for all of its 36 years.

Streeter stressed that each hamburger made at Vista is fresh and made-to-order, not prepared ahead of time.

"It's homemade, like Mom and Grandma would make," Streeter said.

BEST PIZZA: Pizza Hut

The pizza chain with the most retail locations in Manhattan and that has gone from "Makin' it Great!" to "The Best Pizza Under One Roof" was voted Best Pizza in Manhattan by Collegian readers.

"We try to pay special attention to quality," said Brian Roster, shift supervisor at the Aggieville Pizza Hut. "That's what I think makes our pizzas the best."

"We follow special guidelines, called specs, that tell us how much of what, such as toppings, goes on each size pizza.

Those specs, along with a trained and dedicated staff that tries to follow our expectations, make our pizzas the best."

QUIRKIEST ROOMMATE HABIT: Being dirty

One of the joys of living at college is meeting new people to live with.

Never knowing whom you will meet on that first move-in day is simultaneously exhilarating and scary.

Some roommates might be perfect fits; others might not, having unusual habits. Collegian readers said the oddest roommate habit is being dirty.

If a roommate is so dirty that moving to a new room is the only option, residence hall students have the option of filling out a change of room/hall form, available at all residence hall front desks. Filling one out and returning it to the residence life coordinator starts the process to get a new room.

Also available at front desks are vacuum cleaners, where roommates who aren't quite as dirty can clean up after the other roommate, if that is so desired.

HARDEST CLASS AT K-STATE: Calculus I

MATH 220, otherwise known as Analytical Geometry and Calculus I, was voted the hardest class on campus.

Micah Seybold, junior in geography, is just one student who worked his way through Calc I and 2 as a sophomore and found a few problems along the way.

"Understanding the lectures was the hardest part of the class," he said. "The professors went through everything so fast."

While Seybold said he had a friend help him through some of the more difficult assignments, the biggest problem with the class was instructors who couldn't recognize students having trouble with the material.

"They just taught at a different level than everyone was at," he said.

MOST EFFECTIVE CLASS-SKIPPING EXCUSE: Death in a family

K-State students have been known to throw around a few whoppers in order to weasel out of a difficult test or lengthy homework assignment.

The most popular excuse, when looking at Reader's Choice ballots, seems to be the untimely death of a beloved family member.

"I would never fake such a thing, and I hope a student wouldn't either," said Jack Holl, head of the Department of History.

Holl said he and his colleagues probably would not even check on students if they were to miss a class, but an absence for an exam would cause concern around his department. "If a student missed an exam that could not be made up or couldn't meet a deadline for a paper, if the issue was missing a deadline, I've heard several colleagues occasionally ask for a note to confirm the illness," he said.

"If it were a very serious issue, somebody might ask for a note from an undertaker, but there isn't a department policy that I know of."

Holl said he could think of one reason he would question a student claiming a death of a friend or family member.

"I had a student that claimed they had to leave town for a great-uncle's funeral when there was a significant impact on an exam that could not be made up," he said. "I think that was the one case that I asked for documentation."

BEST MEXICAN FOOD: El Cazador

Enchiladas seeping with white cheeses, meaty tacos filled with lettuce and cheese and free chips and salsa.

These could be some of the reasons why students go to El Cazador when looking for the best Mexican food in town.

El Cazador offers something the competition is missing — authenticity, Luis Palomino, manager at El Cazador, said. Palomino said everyone who works at El Cazador is Mexican, and he said he believes this contributes to the authenticity.

El Cazador offers not only authentic food but also variety. People who enjoy traditional Mexican can order burritos, chalupas, enchiladas and chilies rellenos.

Quinci Shaver, freshman in elementary education, said he thinks El Cazador is popular among students because of their reasonable prices.

For Shaver, the atmosphere also makes a difference.

"I like the atmosphere. It feels more authentic and makes for a better meal," Shaver said.

Best spot for a picnic: Tuttle Creek State Park

Beautiful scenery, ease of access and the convenience of being able to reserve shelters are reasons that attract people to Tuttle Creek State Park, said Paul Weidhaas, park ranger at Tuttle Creek.

Tuttle Creek has six shelters for picnicking and campers at $25 dollars a day. Each shelter comes equipped with a grill and picnic tables.

Weidhaas said it is all right if students don't reserve a shelter because Tuttle Creek also has scattered picnic equipment through the park.

Bryan Clark, sophomore in management information systems, said Tuttle Creek is ideal for people who enjoy camping and picnicking.

"There are a few lookout points that have great views and are good picnicking spots," he said.

BEST SELECTION OF COMPACT DISCS: Streetside Records

Rock 'n' roll, reggae, folk, blues, jazz and classical are just some of the varieties of music Streetside Records offers to its customers.

Seth Lamborn, assistant manager of Streetside, said he thinks Streetside provides a more diverse selection of music because it is more in touch with its customers.

"Because we are not a big chain, we are more in touch than our competitors," Lamborn said. "We are also more customer oriented — our staff will help you out to get what you want."

Along with a large selection, Streetside also allows customers to listen to compact discs before they are purchased, Lamborn said.

"Anything we have you can listen to," he said. "It is one of our biggest assets."

Ingrid Espinoza, freshman in business, said she shops at Streetside because of the prices and large variety of music.

BEST DELI SANDWICHES: Mr. Goodcents

Thick freshly baked bread, topped with a choice of meat, cheese and a plethora of toppings might be why students voted Mr. Goodcents as having the best deli sandwich.

Shannon Daily, manager of Mr. Goodcents, said students might prefer Mr. Goodcents because of the reasonable prices, large selection of cheese and the freshness of the food.

For Dana Haley, sophomore in business administration, it's a matter of taste.

"I like the taste of the bread," she said.

"It always seems fresh, and there are lots of choices. I get the basic sandwich with lettuce, cheese, mustard and mayo, but they have quite a few choices for people who like a little bit more."

Mr. Goodcents offers its customers 17 types of sandwiches, five different cheeses, freshly baked bread and lots of extra items to dress sandwiches.

Daily said the atmosphere is conducive to making the dining experience at Mr. Goodcents more enjoyable.

"We have plenty of seating, newspapers to read, chess and checkers that people can play with while they are here," Daily said.

FAVORITE PLACE TO WATCH PEOPLE: K-State Student Union

The K-State Student Union is the top campus spot for people watching.

Sitting in any one spot for an extended amount of time can allow observers the chance to see most of the campus pass by, said Katie Garrett, sophomore in hotel and restaurant management.

"There are a ton of people that come through there every hour," she said.

Garrett said whether students frequent the Union to kill time between classes or grab something to eat, the constant flow of traffic can give onlookers a nice distraction.

"There's kind of a mix of studying, and if you get bored, you can just glance around to see who comes through," she said.

BEST PLACE TO GET IMPORTS: Dick Edwards Auto World and Rusty's Last Chance Restaurant & Saloon

Some were thinking beer. Others were thinking cars. This resulted in Dick Edwards Auto World and Rusty's Last Chance Restaurant & Saloon tying for the best places to find the best imports. "I guess we have the beer, and they have the cars," Melissa Waterman, a bartender at Chance, said.

Waterman said Chance has a large selection of imported bottled beer and beer on tap, which students like.

In addition, the bar has specials every week on different imports, especially Mexican beer.

The most popular import is Corona, Waterman said, probably because it's light like a domestic beer, as well refreshing. Also, students go on spring break to Mexico, try the beer and like it a lot.

Chance also has had specials on Guinness, Bass and New Castle beer. "We try to switch it up," she said.

However, Waterman said members of the military still come in and ask for beer she's never heard of.

"If somebody asks for something, we try and get it," she said. "We always look at new beer all the time."

Chance's managers talk with distributors, try new beers and then decide whether to sell them. Waterman said they buy more imported bottled beer because taps sometimes take up too much room.

Dick Edwards also was chosen as having the best imports, something that came as a surprise to Deanna Nitschke, general sales manager.

"I'm speechless," she said. "I would never have thought we would have been chosen along with Rusty's Last Chance as best imports."

She said students probably chose the business because it is customer-driven and because its main concern is customer satisfaction.

Mazda cars are the most popular, with the Protegé being the favorite among customers, she said.

"It's what you get for the dollar," she said. "It's a nice vehicle for the amount of money."

She said she doesn't expect any new imports, but she said Junction City had just acquired a KIA franchise.

Whether students are looking for a car or a beer, these best imports can be found right in Manhattan.

BEST CLASS FOR AN EASY "A": University Experience

Many students agree that an easy "A" can be gained from University Experience, a class mostly taken by freshmen.

The class teaches basic college skills, such as note taking, effective study habits and test-taking strategies.

Most students said they found it a waste of time. They said to get an A, they only had to show up to class and write a final paper.

"Because you just have to attend and that's it, I got an A," said Jammie Rubio, junior in psychology and political science.

Rubio said the paper was the only important assignment the class had. The students were to tell why they did or did not like the class. Rubio said she wrote her paper on why she thought the class was pointless.

University Experience can give students' grade point averages a boost, but it probably won't be the most thrilling class they could take.

FAVORITE FRISBEE SPOT: City Park

As the weather gets warmer, more students are enjoying getting outside to throw flying disks.

There are many options for flying disk fans, including Ultimate Frisbee and Frisbee golf.

Many students also said they enjoy going to City Park to toss around flying disks.

"I like to play Frisbee in the park because I like to get out because I'm used to being in the country, and I don't get out in the country here," Jennifer Mears, senior in agricultural business, said.

BEST FOOD AFTER MID-NIGHT: Pizza Shuttle

When students come home hungry after a late night out, their favorite choice for food is Pizza Shuttle.

"Pizza Shuttle just seems good when you've been out all night," Lynlee Landrum, freshman in agricultural education, said.

Many students also said Pizza Shuttle is a good treat when they are up all night studying.

Pizza Shuttle is open weekdays until 2 a.m., weekends until 3 a.m. and Sunday until 1 a.m.

Many students in the Kramer Complex and several sorority houses in the area like the idea that Pizza Shuttle is within walking distance from where they live.

"It's open late, and it's affordable," Landrum said.

1999 FOOTBALL SEASON'S MOST MEMORABLE MOMENT: Holiday Bowl

Although it was a long trip to the 2000 Culligan Holiday Bowl, it was worth it for K-State fans.

Students and fans traveled by many means to get to the Holiday Bowl in San Diego, Calif. Some took long road trips in cars, buses or trains. Others took the faster track via airplane.

Many fans said they found it fun to see all the others who had traveled to cheer on the Wildcats.

"It was amazing to see as many K-State fans as we did," said Brandi Thornton, sophomore in early childhood education. "And to think that we all traveled that far just to cheer at a football game."

The Wildcats defeated the University of Washington Huskies 24-20, which fans said made the trip to San Diego even more worthwhile.

"The team winning the game made the trip even more exciting," Thornton said.

BEST LOCAL LIVE-MUSIC SPOT: Rusty's Last Chance Restaurant & Saloon

Don't be misguided by the saloon title: Rusty's Last Chance Restaurant & Saloon is a hip place to kick back and down a few while jamming to the music from local bands.

"We try to get a wide variety of bands. We try not to be narrow by keeping an open mind," Pete Anderson, Chance's manager, said.

Due to the winter months, the bar has not featured as many live bands, but Anderson said with good weather on the way, the schedule is sure to pick up.

Next Tuesday, Sharkey's Little Groove Box and Fly Box are scheduled to grace the stage for some live entertainment.

Anderson said the bar hopes to procure some bands to play on the weeknights this spring so that there is entertainment for those who enjoy frequenting Aggieville, despite the demands of work or school.

"We try to bring in bands during the middle of the week so there is something to do," he said.

One of the advantages of live music at Chance is the amount of space the bar has for spectators.

"We have all types of bands, so sometimes we clear all the tables away to make a dance floor, or other times people gather the tables closer to the stage," Anderson said.

With diversity as the motto, Chance is a haven for anyone who appreciates having a good time.

"We have a diverse crowd, though. There are college students, a crowd from Fort Riley, sororities, fraternities and people just from the community," Anderson said.

MOST ANNOYING THING ABOUT K-STATE: Parking

An often-talked about topic, the parking at K-State, won out as the most annoying aspect of the university.

Whether it is the confusing parking permit rules, the seemingly endless regulations regarding parking, the overall lack of convenient parking stalls or, as some students say, the hard-nosed attitude Parking Services has toward violators, Collegian readers agree parking is annoying.

Many solutions have been proposed to alleviate the parking situation. Shuttle buses, parking garages and increased fees for permits all have been brought forward.

— Brian Clark

BEST DRINKING GAME: Presidents and Assholes

As the weekend arrives, many reach for an alcoholic beverage to prepare for a game of luck or — as some would argue — skill.

Presidents and Assholes is a game that fills many college students' weekend plans.

Richard Maxwell, founder of the Student Underground Drinking Society, said everyone loves "P and A."

In an intoxicated state, the rules often are modified or ignored. However, the basics of the game stay the same.

All cards are dealt to players with the main objective to get rid of all of your cards first. Whoever accomplishes this task is honored with the position of president. The president is able to create special rules and has control of the game. The asshole is the person who is the last left with cards in hand.

"Presidents and Assholes is a great test of luck, skill, tolerance and mercy," Maxwell said. "There is no set number of drinks — it is a matter of how nice you want to be to your neighbor."

— Sarah Sourk

BEST RESTAURANT FOR A FIRST DATE: Gold Fork

The lights down low, soft music in the background and a big menu might have been the reason the Gold Fork took top honors as the best restaurant to take a first date.

"The dim lights create a romantic atmosphere," server Debbie Goodwin said. "The good selection of music also helps."

But, on a first date, the new couple doesn't want to be too inundated with a formal romantic atmosphere.

"The Gold Fork provides a very comfortable and relaxing atmosphere," Laura Dumler, restaurant manager, said. "People don't want to be too uptight with a new date, and they can just be themselves here."

BEST EXCUSE FOR A PARKING TICKET: Visitor

You can only visit once — at least in the eyes of Parking Services.

For those who average more than one ticket per year, new and creative ways to get out of or avoid a ticket are desperately needed. Being a visitor was the most popular excuse.

On a casual Tuesday afternoon, Luran Cowdrey, junior in electronic journalism, pulled up to Dole Hall and realized one of the meters was flashing. Upon parking in the accompanying stall, she pulled out a piece of paper and scribbled "It ate my money, please don't give me a ticket." When she returned two hours later, there was no ticket.

"I already used that excuse earlier in the semester," she said. "It only works once."

Cowdrey, who said she averages three tickets a semester, finds eluding tickets a must.

"I had parked in the museum lot and was ticketed. That's where I used visitor and now I have to come up with other ideas," Cowdrey said.

BEST PLACE TO BUY FLOWERS: Steve's Floral

Famous for its $1.50 cash-and-carry roses, Steve's Floral continues a 13-year tradition.

"Quality and service are our number-one priority," owner Jan Miller said. "We like our flowers to last a long time, and we make sure our employees know how to handle them."

Steve's Floral opened in 1984 in Marysville, Kan. The florist expanded to Manhattan in 1987, and Jan Miller took over ownership in 1990.

"We do a large amount of business with the greek societies and also with the different college departments at K-State," Miller said.

BEST PLACE TO PLAY POOL: Fast Eddys

Twenty-six regulation tables, top-quality cues and an hourly table rent are all factors lifting Fast Eddys to the distinction of the best place to play pool in Manhattan.

"We're really the only bar in town that focuses on billiards," daytime manager Brandi Deppen said. "We even have 9-foot tables, which we hold several B.C.A. professional 9-ball tournaments on every year."

Fast Eddys uses a special cloth on their tables. The 9-ball tables are covered with Somanis.

For the true billiard buff, Fast Eddys offers McDermott Cues, which cost between $125 and $600.

"We even have two new foosball tables for people who don't want to play pool," Deppen said. "There's also a game room, eight televisions and, of course, a full bar."

CLEANEST BAR BATHROOM: Scoreboard

It welcomes visitors with a Big 12 mural and portraits of famous football players from around the conference.

It might not be the biggest bar bathroom, but Scoreboard has the cleanest bar bathroom, according to Collegian readers.

"We make an effort to keep our bar bathroom clean, something other bars might not do," bartender John Chapman said. "I think the nice tiles and up-to-date fixtures also make it look like a good bathroom."

Scoreboard is best known for its large-screen televisions showing every type of sporting event, but it's the details that make the bar what it is, Chapman said.

"We take pride in maintaining a clean atmosphere," Chapman said.

BEST PLACE TO GO FOR CLOTHING AND ACCESSORIES: Krystallos

Providing trendy clothing and accessories to K-State students for the past 13 years has been Krystallos' claim to fame.

"We try to specialize in unique jewelry and fashion," owner Lin Rose said. "We carry the largest selection of sterling silver jewelry in Manhattan."

Krystallos has a variety of misses and teen fashions in many different types of fabric. They also carry hats, scarves and purses.

"They are cutting-edge fashions that have strong oriental influences," Rose said.

The collection of jewelry features rings, toe rings, anklets and other types of jewelry.

"Right now, we have seed-bead bracelets and elastic bracelets with crystals," Rose said. "They are some of our best sellers."

BEST DELIVERED MEAL: Pizza Shuttle

The number 776-5577 is sure to be found on many speed dials around the city of Manhattan, especially around the K-State campus.

Simply by dialing, people can have an entire meal that includes most of the food groups delivered from Pizza Shuttle to front doors in about 20 to 30 minutes.

Not only is it a feast for a student, but it also is within the means of a measly college budget.

It is widely known that pizza can be refrigerated for an unquestionable amount of time. It can be eaten for breakfast, lunch or dinner.

Most importantly, Pizza Shuttle is around to appease those late-night hunger pangs brought on by excessive drinking or intense studying.

BEST UP-AND-COMING BAND: Binge

One might be able to catch the sounds of Binge, a Manhattan-based band, in Aggieville on any random night.

"Our music is an extension that has progressed out of the local scene," Jay Machiela, bass player, said. "It is the kind of music that is for everybody because we have slow songs and fast songs."

The band has been known to play in locales such as Rusty's Last Chance Restaurant & Saloon and Auntie Mae's Parlor.

"We have a different style of music in Manhattan," said Ben Shardein, Binge lead vocalist and guitarist. "It is a new genre of music that appeals to people who are ready to hear something else."

They recently expanded to playing in northeast Kansas and Nebraska.

"USA Dead," a song on the band's demo compact disc, soon will appear on the up-and-coming TruckStopLove album.

"Our music is like a formula — something like one part alternative and one part hard rock," Machiela said.

The band will perform at Auntie Mae's on April 20.

It also will be a part of Haylapaloza, a music festival sponsored by Haymaker Hall Governing Board, on April 29.

BEST SPECIALTY COFFEE: Java Espresso & Bakery

Specialty coffees such as the S'mores Mocha Espresso or the Heaven Breve top the menu at Java Espresso & Bakery in Aggieville.

"We serve 10 or so different specialty coffees, but they can all be enhanced with our 57 different flavor syrups, 11 of which are sugar-free," said Tara Dean, an employee at Java for the past two years.

Besides the collection of specialty and fresh-brewed coffees, Java has a large menu that covers breakfast, lunch and dinner.

"We have everything," Dean said. "There is a variety of baked goods such as muffins, scones and flavored croissants."

KSU student earns Fulbright

By KELLY EVENSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Instead of applying to doctorate programs or searching for a career, Kevin Hauck will be going to Mexico to continue his education.

However, he will be receiving help from the federal government.

Hauck, graduate student in sociology, is one of this year's Fulbright Scholarship recipients. He said the government scholarship is much like the Goldwater or Rhodes scholarships, but the Fulbright is specifically designated for those who want to study overseas.

"I was happy when I found that I had received the scholarship, but the worst part is waiting," Hauck said. "The scholarship gives students the opportunity to continue studying something they have an interest in but can't do without the funding."

Hauck said he will be going to Tijuana, Mexico, to study people who immigrate across the border for cultural, instead of economic, reasons. He said a lot of recent events have shown a desire to increase the militarization of the border.

"Lots of people travel to and from the United States for cultural reasons such as shopping and religious purposes," Hauck said. "Most people haven't really studied the migration back into Mexico, and as we continue to increase military force along the border, it will cut back on the back-and-forth movement."

Hauck said this back-and-forth movement between two cities in close proximity to each other is called cross-border linkages, such as the relationship between San Diego and Tijuana. He said these cities share many things in common, including language and culture, and it is difficult to study these types of phenomena without being there.

"It is important for those who have an emphasis on studies within Latin America or other foreign countries to see how other countries relate to the United States," Hauck said. "This funding allows students to do their own in-depth, individual research on their own and study things that can be hard while in Kansas."

Walter Kolonosky, Fulbright program adviser since 1981 and associate professor of modern languages, said since he has been working with the program, K-State has had 34 Fulbright recipients. He said it is a prestigious award and usually is used Manslaughter case dropped against Jones

By JAMIE BARRETT
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A decision to dismiss the voluntary manslaughter case brought against former K-State student Richard Jones was made Friday.

Jones was facing a May 1 hearing for voluntary manslaughter due to an incident that occurred on January 5, 1999, when Jones shot and killed Steven Waters, one of three intruders who broke into his home.

Jones was arrested for murder on February 25, 1999, and on March 12, 1999, he was arrested again on drug-related charges.

The Riley County attorney said in a press release that the decision to dismiss the manslaughter case was made based on the court's ruling at the April 6 hearing. At the hearing, the press release said the court denied the state's request to introduce evidence essential to the state's case, according to the press release.

The press release also stated that the dismissal without prejudice will allow the Riley County Attorney's Office to re-file charges if additional evidence is discovered. At this time, if the case proceeded and Jones was acquitted, the Riley County Attorney's Office would be unable to prosecute further, even if new evidence were found.

Barry Wilkerson, assistant county attorney, said there are no manslaughter charges against Jones at this time, but he is in custody of the Department of Corrections.

"Jones is serving 20 months with the Department of Corrections due to a conviction of sale of marijuana within 1,000 feet of a school and possession of marijuana with the intent to sell," Wilkerson said.

Golay memorial service today

By SCOTT ALDIS-WILSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Friends and family will gather today to remember a student who always seemed to have a little smile on his face.

A memorial service will begin at 4:30 p.m. at All Faiths Chapel for Darin Golay, senior in hotel and restaurant management, who was killed April 9 in a car accident nine miles southwest of Larned, Kan.

The Rev. Don Fallon, campus minister and leader for the memorial's prayers, said the memorial will be open to anyone who wishes to speak. The memorial will consist of speakers who knew Golay, prayers and pictures from his life brought in by friends, he said.

"The family is coming to share in the service, which we see as a time for healing for the family and the students," he said.

Melissa Nelson, junior in hotel and restaurant management and friend of Golay's, said his April 13 funeral in Garden City had around 800 people attending. The church had to ask people to stop sending flowers, she said, because it couldn't hold any more.

No one is quite sure how many will attend the memorial, Nelson said, but 400 bulletins are being printed in preparation.

"I think it's just kind of a time for us to tell stories and remember what he left us. He was quite a character," she said.

Golay attended classes, worked at Bowinkle's Sports Bar and was a member of the practice players squad for the K-State women's basketball team.

Galen Harkness, graduate student in college student personnel work, was one of Golay's teammates on the squad that helped prepare the women's team for games. Golay was smaller than some of his opponents, but he was fast, Harkness said, and he would go up against anyone.

Not long before the accident, Harkness said Golay was preparing for his summer internship in Hilton Head, S.C.

"He was telling a bunch of people to come up and visit him and stuff," he said.

Pat Pesci, director of the hotel and restaurant management program, said he remembered Golay as a polite, respectful student who always had a little grin on his face.

GOING WILD

Rolling Hills Reserve in Salina houses orangutans, many other exotic animals

It was the last thing Bob Brown expected to see while he was building a swimming pool.

Then came the gun shots, and Brown hit the floor, because after all, he was from a big city.

The air was quiet, and Brown raised his face.

"There were five camels looking at us over the fence," he said.

Directly behind the camels was an apologetic Charlie Walker.

"He said, 'I'm sorry, boys. I was just testing out my new shotgun,'" Brown said. "And that's how I met Charlie Walker."

Walker was a fellow Salina resident and owned a big barn filled with big Belgian horses and exotic animals. Soon after the two met, Brown quit building swimming pools and began working at the barn.

"I fed them, shoveled their poop and gave tours to school kids," Brown said.

These were the same children that would ask a million questions about the animals and whether or not they were endangered species.

Brown and Walker started questioning themselves when they couldn't answer half the children's questions.

"They were definitely smarter than we were. We decided to get smarter than the kids," Brown said. "We were humiliated daily."

The two set out to research endangered animals and how they could help. They flew around the country, looked at wildlife parks and zoos and fixed their attention on a private zoo in Phoenix.

The results of the investigation and of Walker's desire to have a zoo in Salina resulted in the Rolling Hills Reserve, which opened October 1999 and had Brown as park director.

The reserve contains 55 sprawling acres and houses Robbie, a 7-year-old orangutan who playfully tugs one's shoulder from behind his cage. Next to him is Rusa, an older orangutan who is constantly head-butted by Robbie. Both of them scurry inside and make a spectacle of themselves.

"He's a wild thing," Kirk Nemecek, general curator, said. "He'll show off for you."

Assistant dean might step down next week pending offers from other universities

By LYNNE HERMANSEN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Life is about taking the right opportunities according to K-State's assistant dean of arts and sciences.

Dennis Wilson will know next week whether he will stay at K-State and keep his dean position or pursue other career opportunities.

Wilson said although he might be leaving, he has enjoyed his position at K-State.

He came to K-State six years ago as a music professor but moved to the assistant dean's position last year.

Wilson said he is leaving because he wants to have a greater effect on music education. Wilson said he would not mind remaining at K-State if that's where the opportunities take him.

"There is nothing I enjoy more than teaching the students I taught and teaching Wilson now is in the midst of a job search, but his departure is not final.

"There's the possibility that I will be back here one day," Wilson said.

Although faculty do leave sometimes because they can receive a higher salary, Wilson said he looks at salaries differently.

my current students now," Wilson said.

Wilson is considering not teaching if other professional opportunities come up, but six large universities are interested in him.

"Opportunities come by you, and you must be prepared for them," he said, "and able to recognize them."

Wilson said he looks at salaries differently.

"Every school could pay their teachers more," Wilson said. "It's not the quantity of the salary that should be the issue. The issue is the equity of salary."

K-State is not so far off the mark when it comes to salary, Wilson said. Teachers should be paid in full for what they are able to do, he said.

When looking back on the past six years, the best parts have been the associations with other people, Wilson said.

Wilson said he credits President Jon Wefald and several others for his great experiences at K-State.

"None of these people are more important than the students," Wilson said. "I have great students and when they do extremely well, it makes me feel good."

Wilson said leaving K-State would be a difficult thing to do.

"I have enjoyed it here," Wilson said. "There are great people, and I will always remember K-State."

Council Grove restaurant up for sale after 20 years

COUNCIL GROVE, Kan. — A Council Grove restaurant that's been around since Kansas gained statehood is up for sale.

The Hays House Restaurant and Tavern is believed to be the oldest continuously operating restaurant west of the Mississippi River.

Since 1857, customers hungry for dishes such as Beulah's ham have filled the restaurant, making it a mainstay in Council Grove. It still attracts close to 115,000 customers a year in a town of about 2,300 people, well off the major four-lane highways in the heart of the Flint Hills.

"It's an extremely difficult decision to make. I've poured my heart and soul into it, but the timing is right now," said owner Rick Paul, a native of San Francisco.

Rick Paul and his wife Alisa Paul said they're parting with the family-run business to spend more time with their sons, 13-year-old Damian and 7-year-old Alex.

They started at the restaurant 20 years ago, working their way up before buying the business in 1988 from their close friends, Charlie and Helen Judd, whose family had owned it since 1911.

"People a lot of times come here for the history and are kind of surprised that the food is so good," Rick Paul said.

"Our pies, breads and muffins are all baked in-house. I age my beef. We use cast-iron skillets to fry our chickens. Basically, our food is good, home-cooked food."

More than just a restaurant, the Hays House acts as a town meeting place for Council Grove residents. Regulars have been known to eat breakfast, lunch and supper in one day at the Hays House.

"We still provide a coffee bar in the morning," Rick Paul said. "Guys come in and throw in a buck, and they can sit and drink coffee as long as they want."

"The food was great," said Rod Atteberry of Wichita, who had brought a companion, Maret Badenhorst, a native of South Africa, to Council Grove to see the sights. They were worried when told the Hays House was for sale, but there's little chance a sale will mean the end of the trail for the restaurant.

"The Hays House is a vital part of our community, and we anticipate it will be sold and continue to operate as is," said Molly Smith, director of the local chamber of commerce.

The Pauls don't have definite work plans yet. They declined to state an asking price, referring interested parties to their real estate agent, the Dan Weir Co. in Manhattan.

But they now consider themselves Kansans and say they won't leave Council Grove.

"It's a great small town," said Rick Paul. "We'll be proud to stay here and have our kids graduate from Council Grove High School."

Wichita man appeals court decision, clinic still open

TOPEKA — A Wichita naturopath treated patients, but his actions were not unlawful, his lawyer told the Kansas Supreme Court on Tuesday.

The Board of Healing Arts, meanwhile, argued that the law governing such alternative medicine is unconstitutional.

The justices listened to Stephen Plummer, representing Stanley Beyrle, and the board with little comment.

Beyrle is appealing a trial court's finding that he practiced medicine without a license.

He has practiced in Wichita since 1981 and operates the Kansas Clinic of Traditional Medicine.

Naturopathy is the treatment of disease using herbs, minerals and other natural products, along with exercise, diet and other therapies.

The law allows naturopaths who graduated from a college approved by the state naturopathic association to work without approval from the Kansas Board of Healing Arts if they were practicing in the state as of Jan. 1, 1982.

The board has criticized the law, saying it delegates legislative authority to the naturopathic association by allowing it to define naturopathy and naturopathic education. A Sedgewick County district judge later agreed and found the law unconstitutional.

But Plummer says throwing out the law would effectively end Beyrle's Kansas practice.

"The Board of Healing Arts is chipping away at a part of its own statute because they don't like naturopaths," Plummer said.

The Supreme Court's decision is expected June 2.

Online love. At age 45, Lawrence resident Thomas Hodgson, a twice-divorced working man with two teen-age children, thought his prospects for love were dim.

Then he turned to a pen-pal club that helps hundreds of American men each year find mates from overseas.

"At 40-something, I was having a hard time finding a woman with strong family values," Hodgson said.

Now he's engaged to Letecia Senerpida, 23, who lives in Lapu-Lapu, a suburb of Cebu City in the Philippines.

He said he owes it all to the Christian Singles Registry in Plano, Texas, and its founder, Larry McEntire.

For $1,900 McEntire's service guarantees it will use its 60 scouting agents in the Philippines to help a man find a woman.

"We are interested in helping a guy find a wife who goes by the teachings of the Bible. This is real hard to do in America," McEntire said.

"Guys like Thomas are a tragedy," McEntire said. "At his age, he is such a nice, thoughtful guy, yet these are the ones that get kicked around the hardest by American women."

After calling the service, Hodgson received letters from more than 120 women without success, until he received a letter from Senerpida. He traveled to the Philippines in September to meet her and immediately knew she was his match, he said.

"She said she had written to 10 different men over the last few years and met a few, but none of them clicked like we did," Hodgson said.

He said Senerpida is now preparing for her May 2 interview for a fiancée visa.

If a woman marries a fiancée visa, she must marry within 90 days of arriving in America. After two years of marriage she is granted permanent resident status.

Advertising of arranged marriages was outlawed in the Philippines in 1986, but it is not illegal to advertise friendship groups or pen-pal services, said Robert Grisby of Christian Singles Registry.

But many human rights activists oppose the mail-order bride industry, or at least want it better regulated. These groups fear some women are being sold, while other women may find themselves in abusive relationships with little means to get out.

Commission hears strip mall update

By SCOTT ALDIS-WILSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Amid some shuffling of duties, the Manhattan City Commission voted 5-0 Tuesday night to keep moving on the controversial redevelopment district on the east side of town.

The beginning of the meeting marked the annual transfer of the office of mayor of Manhattan, this time from Commissioner Roger Reitz, Commissioner Karen McCulloh.

MCCULLOH

Reitz listed the widening of Anderson Avenue, preparations to expand the local animal shelter and the gain of business such as Light Solutions and Western Wireless as accomplishments during his year as mayor.

"I don't think I've ever done anything that's given me as much satisfaction as being mayor of this city," he said.

Incoming mayor McCulloh said she wanted to create new funding options for the city and to keep a strong sense of cohesion for Manhattan residents.

"We, as a commission and a city, need to see how we can increase the wealth of a community, not just its acreage," she said.

The commission's first agenda vote of the night set May 2 as the date for a public hearing to consider establishing the 34- to 35-acre tract bounded by Third Street, Tuttle Creek Boulevard, Leavenworth Street and Bluemont Avenue as a redevelopment district or strip mall area.

An issue that has been progressing since at least January, the proposal has met opposition from house and business owners in the area that would be redeveloped. The Tuesday meeting was no exception.

"I think you've already made up your mind on this," Ray Karsmizki told the commissioners.

Asking newly appointed City Manager Ron Fehr how many business and persons would be displaced by a redevelopment and receiving a response from Fehr that he did not yet know, Karsmizki said many residents wouldn't be ready to move. In addition, he said, losing his place of business would provide nothing for his sons to take over.

"I could retire when you buy me out, but I'm not going to leave them high and dry," he said. "I know you listened, but did you hear me?"

Attorney Joe Knopp, representing an undisclosed client, said he was concerned about what Manhattan citizens would pay for the change.

"The question I think we're all asking is 'How much is this program going to cost?'" he said. "It seems to me like we ought to have that information before we walk in three days after the next notice."

Area resident and business owner Ruth Schrum said she finds it disturbing that the city wants her property, but the current redevelopment plan won't even work unless Fourth Street is widened, as Third is the traditional business street.

Commissioners voted to proceed, however, stating that the city could still back out at several points if it and the developer, Chicago-based First National Development Ltd., cannot agree. To be finalized, the plan would still need to gain the approval of the Board of Education and the Riley County Commission as well as a city-approved redevelopment plan.

"I'm not prepared to slam the door on the process, because I haven't heard enough," Reitz said.

Commissioner Ed Klimek said he would look for a connection to the downtown, relocation assistance and the city's level of involvement before he approved a final proposal.

"I have to have some really good answers in these areas before we create this project," he said.

In other business, the commission unanimously authorized a maximum of $360,000 in bonds for the construction of new airplane hangars at the Manhattan Regional Airport and a maximum of $150,000 in bonds to renovate existing hangars.

The commission also unanimously approved $7,799 in allocations by the 2000 Neighborhood Grant Review Committee to local groups wishing to establish electricity in Goodnow Cabin, illuminate the Washington Square neighborhood sign and other improvements.

MINOR-INJURY ACCIDENT

A motorcycle/truck accident left only slight cuts and abrasions Tuesday night. The driver of the truck, Melanie Stokka, was stopped at the intersection of Claflin Road and Denison Avenue to make a left turn when the driver of the motorcycle, Travis Davis, senior in construction science and management, started through the intersection traveling north. Stokka was not injured in the accident, but Davis and the passenger, Katie Lamb, received slight injuries. Both were treated at the scene.

2 killed in shooting at senior-citizen apartment

■ Police arrest tenant who opened fire after neighbor's complaints.

By DAVID GOODMAN
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

LINCOLN PARK, Mich. — A tenant at a senior-citizen apartment house opened fire with a rifle Tuesday after he was summoned to a meeting because of neighbors' complaints about his vulgar language, authorities said. Two women were killed and a third woman was critically wounded.

The man was taken into custody about 3:20 p.m. when police stormed his room, said police Lt. Donald Gentner.

The man did not resist and was not injured, but was on narcotics and taken to the hospital for observation, Gentner said.

The suspect's name was not released, and no immediate charges were filed.

Police had spent several hours searching the 14-story building for the gunman after the noon shooting. Other tenants were told to stay in their apartments during the search of the high-rise, and youngsters on the playground of an elementary school nearby were hurried inside and kept there until parents arrived to pick them up.

One of the victims was Marilyn Higgins, a former city council member and a longtime Lincoln Park Housing Commission member, Fire Chief Ernie Moon said. The identity of the other woman killed, a resident of the building, was not released.

Thomas Baize, president of the Lincoln Park Housing Commission, said Higgins was at the building, as she is every week, to go to the grocery store for some residents.

Apartment officials had summoned the man to a meeting after other residents complained of inappropriate language, said Phyllis McLenon, deputy director of the Housing Commission in the suburb 10 miles south of Detroit. McLenon did not explain what she meant by inappropriate language.

At the meeting, the man "was very dissatisfied and making threats. He kept saying he wouldn't have this character assassination and that he would take care of it," she told WDIV-TV. "He was very upset, and was very upset with some of the ladies who were complaining about him."

The man said he had a continuing problem with the women, she said.

McLenon said the man left the meeting and was gone for about 10 minutes, and then the building's maintenance man warned by radio that the man was coming back shooting.

One woman was shot in the face in the building office and another was shot in the doorway, McLenon said. Some people ran to a bathroom or scrambled under a desk to hide.

"He came in looking for us," she said.

Chris Sullivan, who lives on the 13th floor, said he had heard some women complain about the man's language. "I never heard him use foul language, but a lot of the ladies complained he was vulgar," Sullivan said.

Police did not say if the women who were shot were the ones who had complained.

In addition to the two women who were killed, a woman was hospitalized in critical condition.

LOSE 20 POUNDS IN TWO WEEKS!
Famous U.S. Women's Alpine Ski Team Diet
During the non-snow off season the U.S. Women's Alpine Ski Team members used the "Ski Team" diet to lose 20 pounds in two weeks. That's right - 20 pounds in 14 days! The basis of the diet is chemical food action and was devised by a famous Colorado physician especially for the U.S. Ski Team. Normal energy is maintained (very important) while reducing. You keep "full" - no starvation - because the diet is designed that way. It's a diet that is easy to follow whether you work, travel or stay at home (For men too!)
This is, honestly, a fantastically successful diet. If it weren't, the U.S. Women's Alpine Ski Team wouldn't be permitted to use it! Right? So, give yourself the same break the U.S. Ski team gets. Lose weight the scientific, proven way. Even if you've tried all the other diets, you owe it to yourself to try the U.S. Women's Alpine Ski Team Diet. That is, if you really do want to lose 20 pounds in two weeks. Order today! Tear this out as a reminder.
Send only $8.95 + add .50 cents RUSH service to: MIDWEST ASSOCIATES, 3318 S. Glenstone, Suite 308, Springfield, MO 65804. Don't order unless you expect to lose 20 pounds in two weeks! Because that's what the Ski Team Diet will do. © 1999

Fraternity presidents need to set strong precedents

The Fraternity Council of Presidents has failed to set a precedent that will benefit the greek system.

The presidents of K-State's fraternities voted Monday to readmit Acacia fraternity. The vote comes less than one year after Acacia had its charter suspended for five years for four counts of hazing, three substance-abuse violations and two human-rights violations.

The Interfraternity Council refuses to release details of any of these violations.

By welcoming Acacia back with a reduced sentence, the council has sent a strong message the K-State community:

Emphatic alumni can compensate for any violations — no matter how egregious — by K-State fraternities.

When charges were brought against Acacia last May, alumni support was nonexistent. However, following Acacia's suspension, that support began to materialize.

It culminated in Monday night's meeting, at which three alumni members convinced the fraternity presidents that the sins by Acacia would not recur. The presidents, neglecting to consider what Acacia and the K-State greek system had to gain — nothing — appeased the alumni by readmitting the fraternity.

While the brief suspension is a positive sign, IFC President Mike Goodpasture offered a negative one as well. He said that, had alumni support been more visible when allegations first were brought forth, Acacia would not have been suspended.

The precedent set by this decision is disappointing. It fails to show fraternities they will be punished severely for unlawful actions. Rather, they will receive a slap on the wrist — one that can be avoided if fraternity alumni are vocal enough.

The council of presidents needs to use more foresight in making decisions of such magnitude. Rather than make weak decisions on a biased, case-by-case basis, it is time for them to establish firm rules for punishment of wrongdoings.

A sense of morality and concern for the well-being of fellow members is simply not enough to stop hazing at K-State — at least not with such a simple cure on hand.

It is time for IFC and the council of presidents to get serious and provide a clear view of potential punishments for crimes by their members — and not to bend those rules for a few vocal alumni.

Persistence of Vision

Survivors must continue with life while still honoring dead

For thousands of American families, this is a rather rough time on the calendar.

I'm sure the mainstream media hasn't let you overlook this yet, but just for the record, today is the anniversary of both the Waco, Texas, firestorm that engulfed and destroyed the Branch Davidian compound in 1993, and of the bombing of the Alfred P. Murrah Federal Building in Oklahoma City. Worse, Thursday is the first anniversary of an equally shattering event in recent American history — the spree killings of 14 students and one teacher in once-sleepy Columbine High School in Littleton, Colo.

It doesn't help that the preeminent historical event on this date in 1775 — the "shot heard 'round the world" fired at Lexington Common sets off the Revolutionary War — is equally violent, even 225 years ago.

Dark historical humor is no comfort when there's an empty chair at the table.

Wrenching, painful, unforgettable.

Then why do we relive it every year? Why mark the anniversary if we know it all so well? Can't we just go on?

The damage done by these violent acts has left its mark, and the specific incidents are over and closed cases (or, in Waco, just too hopelessly labyrinthine to ever be unraveled) — but the society that produced these acts still remains.

Worse, I doubt any of us believes the conditions that created these veritable tragedies have been erased or simply disappeared.

At best, this is an occasion for vigilance, a renewed call to examine ourselves and our society, to excise the infections which beset the body politic.

At worst, it is a moment to coldly realize that the breath between the last horror and the next might be shorter than we would like, shorter than we need. Perfect society?

Of course not. Worth the effort of making better? Damn right, especially if it means one less day to mark on the calendar.

Also, and more personally, ritual is as important now as ever — mourning continues, sometimes over a frighteningly long period.

Whether mourning a spouse, sibling, child or parent, the distance of time and faulty memory needs to be crossed, reconciled with an occasional visitation.

This is both a right of the survivor and an obligation to the departed.

Don't forget that time is also extremely treacherous and elusive. Too many of my classmates have told me about watching Persian Gulf War footage in grade school, whereas I remember watching it at the K-State Student Union.

History is now an avalanche, and it's absurdly easy to get swept under. Today's current event is tomorrow's history text — faster than you can imagine, faster than you're willing to accept.

We also must let the survivors live. If Columbine High School wishes to return to normal, no part of "normal" includes media saturation and bombardment. If people wish to pause for memory's sake, they may have as much privacy as they would like.

Should they choose to share these moments, that's understandable — but intrusion and exploitation of the wounded, even long after the blood has stopped running, should be guarded against and dissuaded with moral indignation and righteous fury.

And should one pause, uncertain if they are about to commit an act of exploitation or a moment of journalism, then one should go home and go to bed for the rest of the day.

We must mourn, but we cannot dwell. It must only be a pause, a moment to reflect, to honor friends and loves lost, to unwrap old memories and take in their scent once again, if for just a moment.

But tomorrow is lost to the fallen, and they would not have us neglect it simply for their sake. We might stand for a moment, or perhaps our step will falter at this bump in the calendar. What's most important is that we keep walking. It's the one thing we can do. It's what makes us alive.

And that understanding is reason enough to remember.

Society ignores destruction of nature on Earth Day's 30th anniversary

Saturday marks the 30th anniversary of Earth Day. Created in 1970 by Sen. Gaylord Nelson, Earth Day initially focused on educating Americans about environmental problems. It has since grown into a national week of environmental action and awareness.

The United States has made significant strides to protect the environment from the destructive effects of pollution since the first Earth Day. Thanks to regulations from the federal government, 95 million acres of wilderness have been protected and toxic emissions from industrial and commercial sources have been reduced. To a great extent, Earth Day 2000 already has been successful. It has been gaining momentum thanks to endorsements from Hollywood stars like Leonardo DiCaprio. On Monday, President Clinton created a 328,000-acre Grand Sequoia National Monument to preserve the giant trees.

While these accomplishments are commendable, there is still something lacking on our list of environmental achievements.

Americans have yet to embrace the spirit of environmental activism and the necessity of the environmental movement. A recent Gallup poll indicates that 80 percent of Americans support protecting the environment, yet a mere 16 percent actively participate. While these numbers are encouraging, they are far from sufficient.

Anti-environmental ideologies still pervade much of society. It is tragic to think we have been enveloped in the capitalist notions of economics and growth at any cost. Human and monetary gains have become more important than the natural environment. Simple pleasures such as admiring the birds and the bees, the flowers and the trees and even those Delhi Sands flower-loving flies in Southern California seem to hold no value in the midst of uncontrolled humanism.

It is ironic that people have adopted such a self-centered worldview. Aside from their aesthetic beauty, green plants, trees, fresh water, wildlife and the ecosystems in which they all coexist are integral to life on this planet. In the 1870s, John Muir, naturalist and father of the environmental movement, wrote, "When we try to pick out anything by itself, we find it is connected to everything else in the universe." Every time we damage one part of the environment through our domination of it, everything suffers.

In every aspect of society, the United States has sought to stop the domination of fellow humans. This nation fought the Civil War to prove people could not dominate and destroy each other through slavery.

It is interesting that the same lesson is applicable for our human relationship with the environment, and yet we ignore our destructive domination of nature.

Individuals or groups seeking to reverse these trends are deemed extremist, and their ideas are often dismissed from the public forum. Realizing the negative effects of our disregard for the natural environment is not extreme. It is an ethical responsibility and a vital need if Earth is to continue supporting life.

We must end our ignorance of these pressing ethical matters. We need action, and we need it soon. In order to alleviate the current environmental crisis, two issues must be addressed in tandem. First, Americans need to transcend our current system of values and encompass a broader environmental ethic. We are all a part of the great circle of life.

We must stop believing we stand at the center of that circle, orchestrating the development of planet Earth. If you are a religious individual, you should accept this ethic because it is necessary to protect God's wonderful creations.

If you are non-religious, you should adopt this ethic because, ultimately, your survival depends on the quality of the environment. While this requires a fundamental change in thinking, it does not have to be a difficult task.

The second step to action can actually facilitate this ethical transition. Activism is required in all levels of society and at all levels of government.

International, national, state and local environmental codes have succeeded in protecting the environment for the time being. More must be done to ensure the continued recovery of the planet.

More importantly, political and social support for the environment must begin here, at K-State. There is a growing recognition of the need for environmental action among students on this campus. I challenge Student Body President Jake Worcester and Student Body Vice President Dana Pracht to show their support for resolving environmental concerns by reinstating the environmental chair in their Cabinet. I challenge Student Senate to take an active roll in protecting the environment by passing a budget line item to guarantee funding for an official university-organized recycling effort. I also challenge the student body as a whole to accept the responsibility of environmental stewardship and let your voices be heard.

There is only one Earth, and it is our future. The choices we make today regarding the planet will affect the planet forever. Do not let Earth Day 2000 pass us by without making an effort to ensure a healthy environment for future generations and ourselves.

Please join me in making every day Earth Day at K-State.

Environmental problems growing with extinctions

Editor,

Many of our species that are disappearing, even ones that might seem as insignificant as a little fly, are indicators of environmental quality.

When they start to disappear, there is something wrong in the ecosystem. That little fly is only the tip of the iceberg. We are living in a period of unprecedented mass extinction. The underlying cause behind this is, by the way, Scott Roney's so-called unproven problem of our ever-expanding human population.

Roney claims farmers are doing the most to care for the environment.

Actually, agriculture — as necessary as it is for our society — has a pretty bad track record of environmental stewardship. Farmers have, for the most part, cleaned up their act, primarily in response to tightening regulations on agricultural practices.

There still is a lot of room for improvement.

Study indicates humans causing global warming

Editor,

In his column Monday, Scott Roney makes several statements that are misleading.

Roney quotes from MIT professor Richard Lindzen, who said, "a recent Gallup poll of climate scientists ... shows the vast majority doubts that there has been any identifiable man-caused warming to date."

Roney echoes Lindzen's statement that only 18 percent of those polled believe some warming has occurred. Roney fails to note that poll was conducted in 1991 and, since then, many minds have changed. In 1998, American Geophysical Union (one of the organizations whose members were polled by Gallup) issued a policy statement expressing concern over global warming. While it's true that certain AGU members opposed the statement, it was adopted with the general support of the AGU membership. Roney also fails to note that in the original Gallup poll, 66 percent of the scientists surveyed answered yes to a question asking them if they thought human-induced global warming was occurring.

There is little doubt that the climate is warming. The question is, are humans responsible? Unfortunately, the question is complex and lacks a clear answer.

However, we see changes occurring at unprecedented rates and evidence continues to accumulate suggesting that humans are at least partially responsible for global temperature changes. In the face of this kind of uncertainty, the question, at least for me, boils down to prudence. If I'm driving on a foggy highway, I slow down and take precautions in order to avoid harming myself or others. Similarly, I advocate slowing down and being cautious about greenhouse gas emissions.

Ultimately, global warming might turn out to be little more than a nuisance in the technologically developed world, but the majority of humans don't live in this kind of world. In less-developed areas, the environmental changes associated with warming could disrupt subsistence patterns that are barely adequate now. Property rights and economic freedom mean little compared to simple survival, yet our actions as an industrialized society might result in climatic changes that, within a few decades, could imperil the existence of others.

I don't believe we have this right.

associate professor of geography

K-State students should participate in Telefund

Editor,

Telefund 2000 was an extreme success, with more than $1.2 million received in donations.

Every participating college surpassed last year's pledge totals. An all-time high of 1,437 students participated, and a tremendous number of prizes were awarded, along with 80 $250 scholarships.

Funds raised are used in student scholarships, student projects, recruitment, faculty development and educational materials.

I am writing to give my sincere thanks to the Telefund, its organizers and all of the sponsors. Telefund is a wonderful event that accomplishes numerous things for K-State. I had a great time, and I encourage students who did not participate this year to participate next year. The opportunity to give back to the university exists for both students and alumni.

The sponsors this year were amazing. I would like to extend endless thanks to all of the dedicated contributors. Their acts were selfless and kind, and their donations were appreciated.

I encourage you to participate in Telefund 2001. Records are made to be broken, and you have the opportunity to do just that, while being active in the largest student-run telefund in the United States.

Seize the opportunity to make a difference.

Everyone who cares about K-State is a winner with Telefund.

Elliott insults religions; Christianity not 'right'

Editor,

So now Jeff Elliott has checked some other religions and is sure Christianity is the only one that is right.

My experience with other religions is markedly different from his. A number of years ago, the members of my church-school class decided we were tired of being ignorant of other faiths. I am sorry to report that, after spending an hour or two on each of the religions we had chosen, we are still nearly as ignorant as we were at the beginning. We just threw up our hands and quit when we were attempting to study the Hindu faith. We could read the words, and we tried to understand, but nothing made any sense at all.

Actually, I have about the same response to Christians' "God-Talk." They might know what they mean, but I don't.

Like Elliott and most other people, my faith is the faith of my parents, though my beliefs clearly have changed through the years. I don't know what it takes to have a meaningful religion, but I suspect being born into it helps.

I wish Elliott could understand religion just isn't like science. If Earth is round, it is not a table on pillars, with hell below and heaven above, as those who penned the Bible believed. That discovery, however, has no effect whatsoever on the Christian metaphors of heaven and hell. Similarly, there is no reason to believe that only one religion is the path to truth.

Elliott's main concern seems to be what happens after he dies. If he's doing good things to get to a good place after he dies, I'd say he's missing the point.

I hope he realizes that respecting himself and others is its own reward, and that who's right and who's wrong makes little difference where human hearts are concerned.

Students should respect efforts to stop violence

Editor,

This is in response to Erin Schneeweis' column Friday about the negative comments in the Forum.

I would like to thank her for a defense that was well-worded and necessary.

That students on this campus could be so immature and close-minded causes me to seriously consider what it is that I like about this campus. The Take Back the Night march was an event that deserves respect and understanding. It was not a representation of homosexuality or of man-hating. It was simply a way of showing support for all those women who have had acts of violence committed against them, and a statement saying, "We are not going to just take this anymore."

Abuse of women is a common problem. Any woman who has been assaulted or knows someone who has been assaulted knows what these violent acts do to a person. It strips you of your self-esteem; you begin to blame yourself, you lose all trust for almost everyone and you never have felt so alone in your whole life.

As a survivor of a violent act, I know these things firsthand. The fact that a student on this campus would treat such a situation so thoughtlessly appalls me. I would like to thank all the women who participated in that march for standing up for what they believe despite the remarks they must have known they would hear.

It is nice to know that there are people out there who stand up for what they believe.

Speaker wrong on points concerning creationism

Editor,

Duane Gish, a vocal member of the Institute for Creation Research, came to K-State on Monday to present his case for young-Earth creationism. His science was full of errors and misrepresentations of fact.

To briefly hit just one of many points: contrary to Gish's assertions, there are numerous transitional fossils between every level of the taxonomic hierarchy.

From species to phyla, there are transitional fossils between invertebrates and vertebrates, and there is a beautiful sequence of transitional fossils linking modern humans to our Australopithecine ancestors.

The worst of Gish's performance was seeing Christians openly ridicule other Christians, in front of non-Christians. How did this performance possibly further the kingdom of God? St. Augustine wrote 1,600 years ago, "Reckless and incompetent expounders of Holy Scripture bring untold trouble and sorrow on their wiser brethren when they are caught in one of their mischievous false opinions and are taken to task by those who are not bound by the authority of our sacred books."

Gish has been taken to task repeatedly by Christians and non-Christians, scientists and non-scientists. His repetition of errors many times corrected, and his continued ridicule of the scientific community, make Christians a laughingstock and ruin any possibility of witness to scientists who are not Christians.

Further, by insisting there are only two positions possible on evolution — young-Earth, 6-day creation or atheism — Gish denies the real faith of most of his Christian brethren and places a minority interpretation of two chapters of Genesis above the cross of Christ our Lord.

John Staver, who also is a Christian believer, clearly presented that science is not based on an atheistic or naturalistic philosophy, and that morality and ideas of purpose and meaning are theological, not scientific concepts. Gish summarily rejected this fundamental understanding of the nature of science.

I hope and pray Manhattan residents will, like the Bereans extolled by the Apostle Paul, test everything to see if it is from the truth, and reject falsehood in all its forms.

K-State narrows decision of additional women's sport

By NICK BRATKOVIC
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State athletic department is getting closer to deciding on a new women's sport to begin playing in the future, K-State athletic director Max Urlick said.

"We will make a report on Friday to the Intercollegiate Athletic Council," Urlick said. "The main consideration will be the impact that it has on Title IX."

Title IX is a piece of legislation introduced in the 1970s to ensure equity on the athletic fields. The list of sports that could help make K-

State more equitable has been narrowed down to five.

Associate athletic director Cindy Fox said the department has narrowed down its list of potential sports to soccer, softball, women's swimming and diving, equestrian and bowling.

Urlick said adding a new women's sport will further the university's compliance with Title IX. Ideally, Urlick said the department's goal is to have a 53-percent male to 47-percent female ratio of participants. He said the department now operates at a 63-percent male to 37-percent female ratio, and the department is looking to add 65 participants.

Urlick said deciding which sport to add depends on a variety of factors. Such considerations being looked into are start-up costs, annual operation, staffing requirements, support staff, NCAA scholarship, squad size, source of revenue and when is a good time for competition.

"We had to look at would it be better to add a spring or a fall sport," Fox said.

Facility availability is another area that Fox said needed to be evaluated in making a selection. In the event that softball and soccer were selected, the athletic department would need to build new facilities to play in, Fox said.

"We couldn't play soccer in the old stadium because it is already used by the club teams, and we wouldn't want to hurt them," Fox said.

Mary Molt, chairwoman of the Intercollegiate Athletic Council, said representatives from the different sports had a chance to present their proposals at a meeting a couple of months ago.

Molt said they had reports at the last meeting from people who expressed what they had found in their studies.

The department still lacks funds to complete all phases of the baseball stadium. Urlick said making decisions on which sports to add are difficult because of financial constraints.

"It is difficult when we are one of the lower funded athletic programs in the conference," Urlick said.

"So we need to be careful not to over obligate our department."

Urlick said the department is run on self-generated funds, and that the addition of a women's sport will have an effect on what sports the department adds in the future.

Molt said Urlick's proposal will not be in the form of a recommendation, and said that Urlick has been working to further Title IX compliance in recent years.

"Max, since he came here, has been very concerned with gender equity and to continue looking at how we can progress in Title IX issues," Molt said.

Urlick said the university would like to add all of the given sports.

"Whatever we do, we are not doing because we do not like a given sport," Urlick said.

Striking similarities of sophomore golfers creates competitive duo on court

By DEREK BOSS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Head golf coach Tim Norris won't deny the striking similarities between sophomores Bryan Milberger and Scott McNeely. Neither will the players themselves.

"We're both determined, that's for sure. We hate losing," McNeely said. "We both want to see improvement, so we feed off each other. If I see him doing good, it pumps me up, and vice-versa."

However, their likenesses go beyond their principles on the golf course, touching on several indisputable characteristics.

Both men are U.S. Amateur qualifiers for the second consecutive year, including the first in K-State history, both entered the K-State program at the same time, and ability wise, they were about the same coming into this season, Norris said.

Their last names even start with the same letter, and they both were born in the month of April.

In fact, Milberger and McNeely have such a resemblance in their competitive-minded relationship, they even room together on road trips.

"When you give them the choice of who they want to room with, it's pretty obvious,"

Norris said.

Evidently this year, those relations have stemmed to the golf course.

"Scott and I are pretty good buddies," Milberger said. "We both came in as freshmen together and really push each other to get better."

Norris said that's one of the qualities he likes to see among his players.

"There's competition between them, but all of it's healthy," Norris said. "They've both made a lot of progress this year."

That progress is something that excites the Cat coach when looking at the future of Wildcat golf.

"That's the fun part of the job," Norris said. "Getting to watch them come out of high school, there's always an adjustment factor to preparing for college golf. Sometimes you've got to play 36 holes in a day."

"You have to learn how to concentrate — how to turn it on and off. There's a lot of learning that needs to go on to position themselves in a good spot."

So far this season, both golfers boast season-low totals of 69 this spring — Milberger's coming at the Feb. 27-28 Northern Invasion Intercollegiate and McNeely's posted a month later at the Stevenson Ranch Invitational. Both finished as the runner-ups in those respective tournaments, their best marks of the year.

Norris said Milberger has been steady this season.

"Obviously, he's improved over the last year, and that's one of the main things you look at in a player," Norris said. "He's done that by becoming stronger both physically and mentally. He's more mature — he's been there a year and he knows what to expect."

Milberger has notched three top-15 finishes this season, leading the Cats individually on six occasions in tournament competition, including three this spring.

"Bryan's worked hard," Norris said. "He'll be depended on pretty heavily in the next two years. All the other players see how hard Bryan works, and that helps with the team chemistry."

That chemistry has heightened thanks to Norris' sophomore tandem.

On three occasions, Milberger and McNeely have finished No. 1-2 in tournaments this spring for the Cats. Although Norris said the two project different golf games, they're both very successful in helping in the team's overall finish.

"As far as their style of play, Bryan is a little more aggressive on the course, but they're a good combination to have on a team," Norris said.

The Cat coach said he looks forward to the duo's performances April 24-25 at the Big 12 Conference Championship in Hutchinson, Kan.

"Both have solid games and they've played the course before," Norris said. "That's definitely in their favor because they know what to expect."

That expectation, McNeely agreed, should help the two golfers Monday, but playing in the Big 12 Tournament is no easy task.

"It'll be easier from the standpoint that we know where not to hit the ball," McNeely said. "But it's at Prairie Dunes, and that's one of the toughest courses I've ever played at."

At last year's conference tournament, Milberger posted the highest finish on the K-State squad with a 36th place tie.

Although Norris holds high expectations for his sophomore duo in the next couple of years, Milberger said it doesn't impose any added pressure on the two young golfers.

"We know where our role is — we just play it," Milberger said. "We can only do so much, but if we show good leadership, everything will fall into place."

Cats hope to continue 6-game streak

By NICK BRATKOVIC
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State head baseball coach Mike Clark said today's game has a simple theme.

"It's about us," Clark said. "It is about how we play."

The Cats (15-20, 3-14 Big 12) will take on William Woods (8-34) at 2 p.m. today at Frank Myers Field.

K-State needs a win to move one game closer to the .500 mark and increase its six-game winning streak.

It is a string of games that Clark said the team needed in order to battle out of an early season slump.

"We really needed this stretch. Guys are playing hard and gaining confidence," Clark said.

"We kind of had to refocus and have been playing good baseball in the last two weeks."

The Cats did, in fact, turn the corner April 8 with a 15-9 victory over conference rival Oklahoma State, and the streak has continued since then with five straight home wins.

Next up is a William Woods squad Clark said he knows little about.

It is a second-year Division II program and, Clark said, looking for quality competition.

"I don't know a whole lot about them. It looks like they are trying to build a quality program," he said.

"They called last year wanting to set something up."

The Cats will look to continue their strong offensive play of late. During the team's recent winning streak, it has scored in double figures in each game.

In the Cats' starting line-up, they have seven players hitting .300 or better, with second baseman and former Big 12 player of the week Chad Tabor leading off.

K-State will send Todd Lundwall who enters the game with a 6.94 ERA and a 1-2 record, to the mound.

Clark said Lundwall has performed well this season, and that without the other K-State players who are lost for the season, his remaining staff continues to work hard.

"They are battling and doing the best that they can do," Clark said.

This is the final home game for the Cats before they take off on a six-game road trip.

NFL Draft assures Washington Redskins of next Lombardi Trophy

For today's column I present a few loosely connected thoughts on this past weekend's NFL draft. Or "Struggling to find five reasons why the Washington Redskins won't win the Super Bowl," whichever title you prefer.

Speaking of titles, we might as well award the Lombardi Trophy to Norv Turner's boys now and at least save ourselves from having to watch another godawful Super Bowl halftime show.

It took the Redskins all of half an hour on Saturday to take their only glaring weaknesses and turn them into areas of strength. By adding linebacker LaVar Arrington (perhaps the best player in the draft) and tackle Chris Samuels (a 290-pound insurance policy for injury-prone star QB Brad Johnson) with the second and third picks, Washington patched the only holes left from a marvelous offseason spending spree.

Now, a team that was a division champion last season and only a botched long snap away from the NFC title game has become twice as dangerous in a span of a couple of months. Somehow, it doesn't seem fair.

Microsoft, schmicrosoft — let's see if we can get William Penfield Jackson busy breaking up the Skins. I'm sure the Bengals would happily take a piece.

Speaking of the Bengals, was it just me, or did it seem like Peter Warrick was trying to blink back tears when he was introduced as Cincinnati's top pick? I have this hunch they weren't tears of joy. Call me crazy.

Thanks to 200 lousy bucks in Dillard's merchandise and 0.1 of a second on his 40 time, college football's most exciting player now goes the way of Ki-Jana Carter and many other lost souls, wasting a promising career in NFL purgatory. Well, there is a bright side, I guess. At least he and Akili Smith will be able to comfort each other after each of next year's 13 losses.

Speaking of comforts, it was really nice to see all of the K-State draft hopefuls picked as high or higher than they had expected, unlike last year. Not only was it a happy day for them, but it seems to me like K-State's coaching staff got a ringing endorsement from the day's events as well, after San Diego and Atlanta took Damien McIntosh and Mark Simoneau, respectively.

San Diego already is home to former Wildcat center Kendyl Jacox, and Atlanta has former K-State linebacker Jeff Kelly. The fact that both teams took players at the same position, from the same school, seems more than coincidental to me. It shows that they've been impressed with how well K-State has prepared its players for the NFL.

Speaking of K-Staters, maybe the most intriguing draft pick of the weekend came when Chicago took K-State running back Frank Murphy in the sixth round. Murphy has blinding speed and soft hands, and at K-State, he flipped back and forth between tailback and slot receiver with ease.

That could make him a perfect addition to Chicago's razzle-dazzle offense, which employs lots of unorthodox formations and multiple-receiver sets. In addition to using him as a change of pace for the bruising Curtis Enis, the Bears can motion Murphy out to the slot or line him up wide to exploit mismatches, as well as using him as a kick returner. If he's able to stay healthy, Murphy could be absolutely ideal for this offense, making him possibly the best value of the draft.

Speaking of values, wouldn't it be nice if the Chiefs had gotten one? Just one, in the entire draft? Second-round pick William Barteau, a cornerback, would have looked like a good pick — in the third or fourth round. Greg Wesley, another corner, would look like a nice addition as an undrafted free agent. Except that they took him in the third round.

And wouldn't quarterback Joe Hamilton have looked good in a Chiefs uniform when he was still on the board in the sixth round? I guess we'll never know, because the Chiefs took marginally rated cornerback Pat Dennis instead.

For a team that's had an offseason to forget, PR-wise, the Chiefs didn't do anything to lure back fans through the draft. First-rounder Sylvester Morris looks good enough, but everything after that makes little sense.

In addition to Carl Peterson's fixation on overrated corners, he also whiffed on any chance to add a marquee back, settling instead (as he often does) for many mediocre ones — big and slow Frank Moreau in the fourth round and Dante Hall, whose attitude problems got him kicked off the squad at Texas A&M, in the fifth.

For those keeping score, the Chiefs runningback corps now consists of Kimble Anders, Tony Richardson, Donnell Bennett, Rashaan Shehee, Mike Cloud, Moreau, Hall, and sadly, maybe even Greg "The Real Deal" Hill. Lots of names, not much excitement. Someone send out an SOS to Barry Word.

Paraguayan speaks about human rights

By JAMIE BARRETT
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Paraguay scholar Martin Almada was tortured for three years in a Paraguay prison for forming an organization to benefit teachers.

"I was imprisoned because I was accused of intellectual terrorism," Almada said. "It was because of my doctoral thesis, and because I organized a teachers' cooperative in Paraguay."

He was kept in the prison camp from November 1974 to September 1977.

In his presentation Tuesday in Union Forum Hall on the torture and human rights violations that occurred in Paraguay during the 1970s, he told of some of the torture he endured and what he did to ensure justice after he was released in 1977.

Almada said he was kept in prison for more than 1,000 days, and during that time, he was tortured physically and mentally.

"I underwent a month of torture such as pulling out my nails, burning my eyes, and they submerged me in a bath full of human waste and would shock me 'til I signed a document incriminating myself," Almada said.

Almada said the Paraguayan military even tortured his family during his imprisonment.

"My wife died of a heart attack because they would call her and play tapes of my cries and send her my blood-tainted clothes," Almada said.

When Almada was freed, he said he went on a crusade to stop the torture and tried to bring some justice to the Paraguayan people.

"In my case, I have no desire for revenge, because I only want justice so it will never happen again," Almada said.

In 1992, Almada and some of his colleagues made a discovery. They uncovered what now is called the Archive of Horrors, a police archive full of denials, police reports, confessions and files on prisoners, incriminating the Paraguayan government.

Almada said the archive contains thousands of documents proving the injustice.

"There are about 700,000 documents covering nearly 35 years of imprisonment and torture," Almada said.

Almada was called to testify against General Augusto Pinochet, former Paraguayan dictator, when Pinochet was arrested in 1998.

"Pinochet was responsible for the globalization of state terrorism in the 1970s," Almada said.

Almada said his deposition against Pinochet served to expand the accusation against him.

"There are many lawsuits against Pinochet all over the world," Almada said. "What he did happened nearly two decades ago, but his arrest is the first attempt in the globalization of justice."

Almada was sponsored by Sigma Iota Rho, an international interdisciplinary honor society that deals with international relations. Karen Gaffin, senior in Spanish and political science and president of Sigma Iota Rho, said Almada had an important and personal message to get out.

"Most people in Kansas don't hear explicit accounts of things like what happened in Paraguay," Gaffin said. "We thought what Dr. Almada had to say was something that K-State needed to hear."

Fred Hebert, graduate student in modern languages, also said he felt as though Almada had an important story to tell people.

JUSTIN HAYWORTH/COLLEGIAN

Paraguayan scholar Martin Almada speaks to a crowd Tuesday evening in Union Forum Hall. He talked about the torture and human rights violations that occurred in Paraguay during the 1970s.

"I have been to Paraguay myself and know many students whose parents and families experienced the regime of the 1970s," Hebert said. "Hearing a firsthand account of that is very personal."

Renovations to Union nearing completion; last phase already under way

By KELLY EVENSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The renovations to the K-State Student Union almost are complete, but one phase remains — the Union Plaza.

Bernard Pitts, director of the Union, said a temporary fence was moved in April 10 so demolition could begin on the site. He said completion dates could change as conditions alter due to unexpected circumstances, but he said the plaza should be completed by the middle of the fall semester.

"The plaza has gone through several variations of concepts since the beginning," Pitts said. "Most of the work done underground was done during the 1940s and '50s. You just do not know what will happen when working on a demolition project."

Pitts said the vision for the plaza is that it will set the tone for the rest of the Union. The bulk of the flat surfaces will be colored pavement, and he said heavy landscaping will be involved. A covered canopy, a grassy knoll and a water feature all will be part of the plaza's construction.

"There will be an opportunity to do programs in the area, and it will continue to be the free-speech zone," Pitts said. "The plaza will have unique features that will not be found anywhere else on campus."

Pitts said the $11.5 million fund for the entire Union enhancement project will contribute to the plaza's construction. He said the plaza will cost almost $1 million.

Lori Winter, senior in management information systems, said the plaza will be good for students because of the better environment for spending time outside.

"The students will like it," Winter said. "It will give students more of an opportunity to sit outside and eat or talk with friends."

Pitts said an alternative list has been established, so as extra money becomes available, more items can be added. This list includes a two-tiered terrace that will be accessible from the North dining area.

He said because students have the potential of using the dining area seven to eight months out of the year, this item is important to have available. Seating also was reduced in the north dining room because of renovations, so the outdoor area will ease overcrowding inside.

A cascade water feature also is one of the items that will be included from the alternative list. Although it will not be a fountain, Pitts said it will add to the atmosphere of the plaza. Other items are on the alternate list, and he said they would be revisited later if more money becomes available.

"The water feature will add to the ambiance in the plaza," Pitts said. "We are making the most efforts to use the same quality of materials outside as we have used inside during the renovations."

Winter said she liked the idea of the outdoor dining area because it will allow students to have other options of where to eat when the weather is nice.

"I think people will like the open dining area," Winter said. "When the weather is acceptable, people can eat outside instead of being stuck indoors all day."

Pitts said students and faculty will be able to use one section of the plaza as it becomes available. He said at no time will the entire area be blocked off, although for a period during the summer, the north entrance will be closed. Once classes begin this fall, however, Pitts said all entrances will be accessible into the Union.

union renovation

A temporary fence was moved onto the Union Plaza yard April 10 so demolition could begin on the site. The plaza should be completed by the middle of the fall semester. The plaza will cost almost $1 million. A covered canopy, a grassy knoll and a water feature all will be part of the plaza's construction.

"After all of the hard services are completed in October, the landscaping of the plaza will begin," Pitts said.

"We hope that the plaza will become a gathering point for students on campus."

Cancer center educates public

Center to be relocated to Ackert Hall addition.

By KELLY EVENSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Cancer research on campus might reveal that K-State is more than an agricultural college.

Terry Johnson, director of the Center for Basic Cancer Research, said the center works with outreach programs to help educate the public about cancer. These programs are free to the communities that request them.

"We go to citizen organizations throughout the state who want to hear what we are and what really goes on with cancer," Johnson said. "We educate about the diseases, but also represent the university as a large, comprehensive institution."

"By going to talk to these communities, we find that they are surprised that the university has programs such as this, and it broadens us to a comprehensive university."

Johnson said most of the studies done at the center are concerned with prostate, breast and skin cancer, as well as leukemia. However, he said the research done on these specific cancers can be applied to many of the more than 200 different types of cancer.

"Although most statistics are not necessarily going up in reported cancers, prostate and breast cancer statistics are slowly increasing," Johnson said. "Cancers will cause disease in one out of three Americans. No person will escape its influence because even if we are not victims, people will know someone who has a cancer."

The cancer research center was started 20 years ago as a way to increase the quantity and quality of cancer research and to train individuals to enter the program.

The center has more than 40 laboratories, and researchers work on projects from anti-cancer drugs to understanding how cancer cells arise. Scientists at the center also recently have received patents from the U.S. Patent Office.

Richard Consigli, distinguished professor of biology, said the involvement of many different people from various fields of study is one reason for the center's existence.

"Every family member is afflicted in some form by cancer," Consigli said. "Any way that we can help an individual or a family is a benefit. It is like a community service that we offer."

Consigli said he has dealt with many undergraduate and graduate students through the years as they are working in the research laboratories. He said he has seen a significant rise in interest among students in the area of cancer research because of the serious implications it causes and the search for cures.

"There is a big interest in this area because it is an important problem," Consigli said. "Anything we can do to gain information about these diseases and remove it from the face of the Earth is intriguing and important."

Johnson said the center granted 140 scholarships to new and continuing undergraduate students this year. He said the gifts made by private donations have made it possible for the number of scholarships to be increased year after year.

"The gifts made to the center are essential," Johnson said. "We have gained progress in the last few years because of the generosity of the public."

The cancer research center is located in an off-campus industrial park. However, because of a new addition to Ackert Hall, the cancer research center will be moved back to campus when the addition is completed next year.

THE MISSION

In 1980, the Center for Basic Cancer Research adopted three objectives

Research

■ is conducted by more than 150 scientists, students and technicians in about 40 laboratories.
■ programs include faculty travel fellowships, faculty research awards, equipment awards, graduate research stipends, research and technical support.

Education

■ of the next generation of scientists, with cancer-related courses and workshops to enhance the classroom experience.
■ programs include undergraduate student scholarships, undergraduate student cancer research awards, graduate student travel awards and the George S. Bascom Workshop Series on Current Issues in Clinical Medicine.

Outreach

■ efforts to inform citizens about the various forms of cancer and efforts to combat it.
■ projects include "A Day with Dr. Wadley," a coloring book for children that introduces the topics of science, cancer and good health.

Once in a Lifetime engagements and weddings

Sharing your engagement and wedding announcements in the Collegian the first Friday of every month.

Your engagement and wedding are special moments in your life and the Kansas State Collegian wants to help you share the news with family and friends. This semester you can put your announcement with a picture in the Collegian's "Once in a Lifetime" special section for FREE.

"Once in a Lifetime" runs the first Friday of every month.

To publish your announcement, please complete the form and take it to Student Publications, Kedzie 103 (east of the K-State Student Union). The deadline for getting your announcement in the paper will be the Wednesday preceding the publication date.

To place a FREE engagement or wedding announcement in the Collegian, complete and submit the following form with a vertical photo to Kedzie 103.

Overturning tainted convictions tougher for judges

By RICHARD CARELLI
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The Supreme Court, struggling to clarify its own past rulings and a 1996 law enacted by Congress, made it harder Tuesday for federal judges to overturn tainted convictions and sentences in state courts.

But the justices' splintered reasoning left in doubt the court's ultimate intent in a decision that potentially affects more than 3,600 death row inmates and hundreds of thousands of other prisoners nationwide.

"We have to wait and see how lower courts utilize this ruling," Texas Tech law professor Timothy Floyd said.

"It's now harder for state defendants to get into federal court, but it remains to be seen how much harder."

At issue was the effect of the Anti-Terrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act, a 1996 law aimed in part at cutting the time between sentencing and executions in capital punishment cases.

For centuries, people convicted in state courts have had the right to appeal to federal courts, contending in habeas corpus proceedings that their prosecution violated some federally protected right.

"This decision makes clear that the writ of habeas corpus is not to be used as a device to go judge-shopping, running the same marginal claims past multiple sets of judges," said Kent Schedigler of the conservative Criminal Justice Legal Foundation.

But Larry Yackle, a Boston University law professor who filed a friend-of-the-court brief for the American Civil Liberties Union, said, "Today's ruling doesn't shut the federal courthouse door. Some state inmates will win."

A series of Supreme Court decisions limited federal court access for state prisoners, and the 1996 law further restricted federal judges' second-guessing of state court conclusions.

That law barred federal court relief unless a state court ruling is contrary to, or involved an unreasonable application of, clearly established federal law as determined by the Supreme Court.

Writing for a 5-4 majority, Justice Sandra Day O'Connor said the law requires a hands-off approach by federal judges unless a state court clearly is wrong about some Supreme Court precedent or "unreasonably applies that principle to the facts of the prisoner's case."

That standard is stringent, but not as restrictive as one the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals adopted when it upheld the death sentence of convicted Virginia murderer Terry Williams.

Joining O'Connor in setting the new standard were Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist and Justices Antonin Scalia, Anthony M.

Kennedy and Clarence Thomas.

The court's four more liberal justices — John Paul Stevens, David H. Souter, Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Stephen G. Breyer — voted to allow greater federal court access.

But the court split 6-3 — with O'Connor and Kennedy joining their four more liberal colleagues — in overturning Williams' death sentence.

Writing for the six, Stevens said Williams is entitled to a new sentencing trial because he was denied constitutionally adequate legal help.

Williams said he would have received a life prison term, not a death sentence, if a court-appointed lawyer had done a minimally adequate job.

The justices said the Virginia Supreme Court's decision upholding Williams' sentence was both contrary to and involved an unreasonable application of this court's clearly established precedent.

But the court never explained just what makes a ruling unreasonable.

"It is a common term in the legal world and, accordingly, federal judges are familiar with its meaning," O'Connor said in her opinion.

Not necessarily so, said Evan Lee, a professor at the University of California's Hastings law school in San Francisco.

"Justice O'Connor thinks judges will know it when they see it, but will they really?" he said.

"The lack of guidance to lower courts is a real disappointment."

Rehnquist, Scalia and Thomas voted against giving Williams any federal court relief.

The mildly retarded Williams was convicted of killing Harris Stone, who was found dead at his Danville, Va., home in late 1985.

Williams confessed to fatally beating Stone and stealing his wallet, which contained $3.

At the sentencing trial, Williams' lawyer never informed the jury of Williams' low intelligence or his dreadful childhood, which included savage beatings by his father, and both of his parents being jailed for criminal neglect.

In a separate decision involving a different Virginia death row inmate, the court, in a unanimous decision written by Kennedy, made it somewhat easier for state prisoners to raise issues in federal court that they did not pursue in earlier state court appeals.

In the case of Michael Wayne Williams — convicted of killing Morris Keller Jr. and his wife, Mary Elizabeth, during a 1993 robbery in Cumberland County, Va. — Kennedy said the 1996 federal law lets federal courts consider issues inmates failed to raise in state court if they failed to discover certain information despite diligent efforts.

The ruling allows Williams a federal court hearing on his claim of prosecutorial misconduct and juror bias.

Historic mansion still entices tourists to visit

It was built in 1905 and has not changed much over the past 95 years. There are 25 rooms, including 11 bedrooms and a ballroom, and they still contain the original furniture and Edison light fixtures that were purchased at the World's Fair in 1904.

The Seelye Mansion, built by pharmacist A.B. Seelye in Abilene, is one of the most complete and historic houses of its age, owner Terry Tietjens said.

Seelye built the mansion at a cost of $55,000. Tietjens said Seelye made a trip to the World's Fair in St. Louis specifically to buy furnishings for the house.

At the time he built the mansion, Tietjens said Seelye owned a successful traveling pharmacy business, which he started in Abilene in 1890.

"He had the largest pharmacy company in mid-America at the time," he said. "He had between 400 and 500 wagons that covered 14 states from the Rocky Mountains to the Mississippi River, and from North Dakota to Texas and even into Mexico."

Tietjens said some of the products Seelye made and sold included talcum powder, cough syrups, sewing machine oil, hair tonic, vanilla extracts and cure-alls like Wasa-Tusa and Fro-zona.

"Many of the customers were farm people," he said. "Women really looked forward to the salesman because they depended on them to bring the latest perfumes and medicines."

Many of the original artifacts from the A.B. Seelye Medical Company, including some of the original products made around the turn of the century, can be seen in the museum that sits next to the mansion.

The three-story mansion was purchased by Tietjens with all of the original contents in 1982 from Seelye's daughters, Helen and Marion.

He said the daughters never married and lived together in the mansion their entire lives, changing very little of it.

Included in the original furnishings were china and crystal dinnerware as well as electric fixtures bought from Thomas Alva Edison, a Tiffany-designed fireplace, a Steinway Grand Piano made in 1920 and an Edison cylinder phonograph, which still uses the original needle and records dating back to 1902.

Tietjens said several original novels make up the mansion's library.

"A.B. Seelye collected complete works of authors, and he had several first editions," he said. "Each and every book is signed with Seelye's name and when and where he bought it."

Besides a library, the mansion contains a music room, a dining room, kitchen areas and several bedrooms.

Tietjens said each drawer and cabinet in the mansion still contains all of the original items the Seelye family had been using. Nothing has been removed.

The third floor opens up into the ballroom. Tietjens said it was typical to have a string quartet sit in the alcove and play so the guests could dance.

Lining the outside of the ballroom are several bedrooms that often were used by the guests.

"Every night, almost all of the bedrooms would be full of overnight guests," he said.

In the basement of the mansion is the recreation room. Tietjens said that at one time, the room contained penny arcade equipment and carnival devices. These games were removed and thrown away when they didn't work anymore.

The only game that remains in the room is an original bowling lane that Tietjens said arrived from the World's Fair in 1905.

"The balls are like the ones used in Canada," he said. "They're smaller and made out of solid walnut."

Instead of trying to knock pins down, he said the object is to flip the paddles and then total the score of the paddles.

Tietjens said Helen and Marion Seelye continued to use the bowling lane up into their 90s.

Barbara Stensaas, volunteer at the Abilene Chamber of Commerce, said the mansion is a very important part of the town's history.

"The house has been here for years and years," Stensaas said. "Not only was Seelye an important man in the town; his daughters were involved in the community as well."

She said the Seelye Mansion is one of the first places visitors notice.

"Everybody asks about it when they come into town because it's so pretty and interesting," she said.

Tietjens said the mansion is very unique to the area.

"It's an impressive home, and you won't find another like it in Kansas," he said.

Part of the K-State display at the State of Kansas Sports Hall of Fame includes the Governor's Cup and Sean Snyder's jersey from 1992. The hall is full of memorabilia from Kansas high school, collegiate and professional athletes.

Finding history in Abilene

Sports Hall of Fame features K-State athletes

Even though Veryl Switzer no longer plays sports for K-State, the former football and track letter winner always will be remembered as an athlete in the Kansas Sports Hall of Fame.

"It's a tremendous honor to be recognized by peers, friends, colleagues and judges and become one of the few athletes in the Hall of Fame," he said.

Switzer, who was inducted into the Hall of Fame in 1990, is only one of a handful of Kansans who have been recognized for achieving athletic greatness.

The Hall of Fame is full of photographs, artifacts and information about Kansas' greatest moments and players in high school, college and professional sports, Kevin Johnson, development director, said.

"The Kansas Sports Hall of Fame was opened in Topeka in 1961 by the Kansas Legislature, who wanted to somehow celebrate the centennial," Johnson said.

The Hall of Fame was moved from Topeka to Lawrence and then to Abilene. He said Abilene was chosen because of the all of the tourism, especially from the Eisenhower Center.

Since its opening, 79 people have been inducted into the Hall of Fame. Johnson said an additional five will be inducted June 10, including former K-State basketball coach Jack Gardner.

He said the inductees are nominated and then narrowed down to the top 20. From that list, the Hall of Fame Board of Trustees votes on the year's inductees.

The number of inductees varies each year, but Johnson said the number usually averages around five a year.

He said even though most people only think of basketball, football and baseball, the Hall of Fame inductees include people who excelled in rodeo, jockeying, trapshooting and wrestling.

Besides portraits of the inductees, the Hall of Fame includes a maze of photos, jerseys, medals, trophies and sports equipment.

"We have several vaults full of jerseys and artifacts, so we try to squeeze in as much as possible," Johnson said. "We also try to have temporary traveling displays like ones on old arenas and referees."

Also included in the artifacts is an autographed Babe Ruth baseball and two Olympic gold medals, including the first one ever won by a Kansan.

"The Kansas Sports Hall of Fame gives a great history of Kansas sports," Johnson said. "It's like walking down memory lane."

Interactive touch screens located in the Hall of Fame allow visitors to research information on the inductees, as well as high school

There have been 79 athletes inducted into the State of Kansas Sports Hall of Fame since it was established in 1961. Many of the inductees have ties to Manhattan and K-State, including Jim Colbert.

individual records and state championships.

In addition to the high school information touch screen, Johnson said the Hall of Fame is working on expanding the high school exhibit by opening a display room that will include jerseys and artifacts of players and championship teams.

He said the overall goal of the Hall of Fame is to educate, honor and inspire other people.

"Any positive role models we can have is great," he said. "The more we can have, the better."

Switzer said the Hall of Fame has great meaning for the athletes as well as the general public.

"The Hall of Fame has significant impact on how people perceive you as an athlete," he said. "It also gives images and models for young people to look up to."

Johnson said he thinks it's hard to believe how many people have made a difference in Kansas sports.

"It's amazing how many great stories and great athletes there are," he said. "The Kansas Sports Hall of Fame is an excellent way to preserve the history of Kansas sports."

The Seelye Mansion was built by the A.B. Seelye family after attending the 1904 World's Fair in St. Louis. Goods were purchased at the fair and shipped to Abilene to build the 25-plus-room home, complete with Edison light fixtures and a bowling alley in the basement.

Eisenhower Center offers visitors historic displays of World War II era

Dorothy Rogers still remembers when she attended President Dwight D. Eisenhower's first inaugural ball in 1953.

"It's one of the most exciting things I've ever done," Rogers said.

Even though tickets for the inaugural ball were hard to come by, Rogers, who was a sophomore in college at the time, said she and a friend managed to get two.

"We went in our very best dresses, and we even wore our white kid gloves," she said. "I can still remember Ike and Mamie up in a balcony setting. They looked so nice. It was very special."

Rogers, who originally is from Connecticut but now resides in Wichita, was making her first visit to the Eisenhower Center. She said the Eisenhower and World War II displays brought back many memories.

"I had a brother that died in World War II, so this is very poignant," she said.

The center was built in Eisenhower's home town of Abilene as a military memorial to the World War II, five-star general, Colleen Cearley, public affairs specialist, said.

"Eisenhower was a big military hero," Cearley said. "This was a way to help remember World War II."

The center is made up of five different buildings, including Eisenhower's family home and the Place of Meditation, where he is buried along with his wife, Mamie Doud Eisenhower, and their first-born son.

Also included as part of the center is the museum, which includes displays and facts about Eisenhower's life, including his military and presidential careers, Cearley said.

There also is a temporary gallery in the museum, which changes once or twice a year.

"The temporary gallery shows what was going on during Eisenhower's time period," Cearley said. "It's not just about the man."

The temporary gallery has included tapestry and presidential china displays as well as a Barbie doll display.

The current gallery display features reproductions of first ladies' gowns.

"It shows what the first ladies or whoever was hostess of the White House wore," Cearley said.

The center has tried to focus on the history of the Eisenhower era but at the same time relate it to younger people, she said.

"We have been very conscious the farther away from the time period we get," Cearley said. "We really need to focus on the educational side because we've moved away from people who can really associate with it."

Jeanne Duvall, who is from Wichita and has visited the Eisenhower Center before, said the museum's displays are very accurate.

"I think it's so smashing," Duvall said. "Eisenhower was such a great man, and this is such a good way to remember him."

Oklahoma City opens memorial

By KELLY KURT
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

OKLAHOMA CITY — Jeannine Gist stood looking out Tuesday through a window blown to shrapnel by the Oklahoma City bombing and found what had been missing in her life for five years.

"I feel peace," she said, looking out from a bomb-damaged building at the spot where her daughter died at work on April 19, 1995.

The Oklahoma City National Memorial — consisting of a long, dark reflecting pool and 168 chairs for each of the victims — stretched before her on the spot where the Alfred P. Murrah Federal Building once stood.

The memorial will open today, the fifth anniversary of the deadliest terrorist attack on U.S. soil.

Two ceremonies will mark the opening: A private one for families, survivors and rescue workers, and a public ceremony where President Clinton is scheduled to speak.

Thousands are expected to attend. There will be hymns, a flyover of military jets, the ringing of church bells, the readings of the victims' names and a moment of silence in their memory.

Across from the memorial, at the bombed-out shell of what was the Journal Record newspaper building, a museum is being constructed where visitors will be able to hear the bomb blast and learn more about the victims. The museum is scheduled to open in November.

"I'd like them to leave thinking, 'If there is anything I can do to make sure this never happens again, I will do it,'" said Gist, whose daughter, Karen Carr, 32, worked on the federal building's fourth floor.

At the interactive museum, visitors will be taken from everyday life right before the blast, hear the bomb as it was recorded during a meeting in a neighboring building and see the community's response and the national outpouring that followed.

The story will be told simply, without drama, museum director Sunni Mercer said, pointing to one example — a box holding keys plucked from the crumbled federal building. Piles of these unclaimed house keys, locker keys and gate keys will be on display, all speaking to the normal lives changed by an act of terrorism.

David Page, managing editor of the Journal Record, had just stepped out of his office for a cup of coffee that April 19 day when the bomb went off, sending long shards of glass flying like knives. A pink scar on one of his hands is a reminder.

On Tuesday, he visited the former newspaper office but was ordered for safety reasons to stay away from the hole that once was his window.

Looking out on the memorial's green lawn, the Survivor Tree and the black granite pool, he said: "I think it looks nice. It is a peaceful look, seeing it now."

Some of the 168 chairs are smaller than the others, representing the 19 children who died.

Clinton denies sale of destroyers to Taiwan

By BARRY SCHWEID
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — President Clinton's decision to shelve Taiwan's request to buy four billion-dollar U.S. destroyers produced an angry response Tuesday from three Republican senators, including Majority Leader Trent Lott.

Their statements suggested a legislative showdown with the White House loomed. But Lott made no overt move to try to force a vote on the island's defense requests.

Declaring his disappointment, Lott said the Clinton administration should have done more to enhance Taiwan's security.

"I hope this latest decision will not be misunderstood by Beijing's leaders as a green light for further threats against Taiwan," the Republican leader from Mississippi said.

Accusing the administration of misrepresenting a smaller arms package it approved as robust, Sen. Jesse Helms, R-N.C., said only one of Taiwan's six main requests, Maverick missiles, was approved.

In fact, the chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee said the administration has given Beijing a veto over Taiwan's defense request.

Sen. Tim Hutchinson, R-Ark., said in a separate statement the administration had sent the wrong signal to Beijing — that intimidation will limit the type and quantity of arms sold to Taiwan for its defense.

Helms' spokesman, Marc Thiessen, said Clinton's decision violated the letter and spirit of the Taiwan Relations Act, which in 1979 created a basis for dealing unofficially with Taiwan and provided for weapons for self-defense.

Thiessen said decisions on arms sales to Taiwan were supposed to be based exclusively on an assessment of Taiwan's defense needs in cooperation and consultation with Congress.

This administration has not consulted Congress, he said.

American officials notified the Taiwanese at a meeting here Tuesday and also in Taipei of the president's decision.

Clinton on Monday decided against the sale of four Aegis destroyers to Taiwan but approved a smaller package including long-range radar designed to detect missile launches, two senior U.S. officials said.

Clinton, who was in California on a tour of impoverished areas, acted on the recommendation of top advisers who met earlier in the day at the White House and also of Secretary of State Madeleine Albright, who was traveling in Uzbekistan, the officials said.

The Pentagon recommended the administration put off Taiwan's request to buy new weapons, including the destroyers, submarines and anti-submarine aircraft, in order to avoid angering China, which views Taiwan as a rebellious province.

Looking for an ADVENTURE

THE ADVENTURE OF A LIFETIME BEGINS WITH AIR FORCE ROTC

Are you a:
- Freshman
- Sophomore
- Junior/Senior with 2 academic years to go starting fall semester

Air Force ROTC is an elective — but it's far more than that. Air Force ROTC is also a program that teaches you to be a leader, develops your management skills, and helps you grow into a well-rounded and self-assured person. For those who qualify, Air Force ROTC can even help pay for college through its scholarship programs. When you graduate, you'll also become an Air Force officer doing exciting, meaningful things alongside other great people in fascinating places around the world. If you're interested, it's not too late to join. There's no obligation — as a matter of fact, you don't have to decide to join the military until your junior year. So go ahead, give it a try — you won't regret it.

U.S. fails at attempt to censure China's human rights record

By GEIR MOULSON
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

GENEVA — The United States failed Tuesday in its latest bid to have China's human rights record censured by the United Nations, but Cuba, Iran and Iraq found themselves under scrutiny.

The 53-nation commission voted 22-18 for a no-action motion proposed by Beijing to block discussion of a U.S. resolution critical of the human rights situation in China.

Twelve nations abstained, and one was absent.

Developing countries, many from Africa and Asia, rallied to Beijing's cause as they did in eight previous years.

The United States said it succeeded in drawing attention to China's record and said the margin of the vote was the narrowest in five years.

"It pokes a hole in the aura of immunity that only China has enjoyed and conveys a sense that all nations have to look to the commission before they confront their own people," U.S. Assistant Secretary of State Harold Koh said.

China applauded the U.N. decision. Attempts by the United States to censure it can lead nowhere but self-isolation and self-defeat, Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesman Sun Yuxi said in remarks carried by China's official Xinhua News Agency.

"The human rights situation in China is the best ever in the country's history," Sun said.

The vote came after weeks of intense lobbying by both sides. The U.S. text protested increased restrictions on Tibetans and the harsh crackdown on political opposition.

It noted repression of the Falun Gong spiritual movement.

Xiao Qiang, executive director of Human Rights in China, said he was terribly disappointed and said the European Union's failure to lend strong backing to the U.S. efforts had been a key factor.

Meanwhile, the U.N. panel censured Cuba for the second consecutive year, voting 21-18 to criticize it for the continued violation of human rights and fundamental freedoms.

Fourteen members abstained. Cuba accused Washington, D.C., of being the driving force behind the action.

Ambassador Carlos Amat said U.S. officials once again wielded the strings of their occasional puppets, referring to the Czech Republic and Poland, which proposed the motion.

In another narrow vote, the commission kept Iran under scrutiny for human rights abuses, even though it accepted that progress had been made.

The resolution was adopted 22-20, with 11 abstentions.

Delegates had less sympathy for neighboring Iraq, which they condemned for its all-pervasive repression and oppression.

No nation supported Baghdad, although 21 abstained.

Lawsuits brought in Columbine case

By ROBERT WELLER
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

GOLDEN, Colo. — The parents of a slain Columbine High School student sued the sheriff and several deputies Tuesday, alleging they ignored warnings about the teenage killers that could have prevented the massacre.

Michael and Yonda Shoels' lawsuit was the first of several expected to be filed by Thursday, the one-year anniversary of the attack that left 15 dead, including the Shoels' son Isaiah and the two student gunmen.

The victims' families have one year to sue under the statute of limitations.

Nearly two dozen notices of intent to sue the sheriff's office were filed in October, most involving two allegations: that Jefferson County Sheriff John Stone's deputies failed to take action when told of threats one of the gunmen made in March 1998, and that authorities mishandled their response to the attack.

"The sheriff's department, Sheriff Stone, Lt. (Terry) Manwaring and the deputy sheriffs stood by while innocent children were shot," the Shoels' lawsuit alleges.

County Attorney Frank Hutfless, who represents the sheriff's department, did not respond to a request for comment.

On Monday, Hutfless said: "While we sympathize with the families of the victims and the community, the fact is that two people were responsible for the deaths and injuries at Columbine High School on April 20."

Eric Harris and Dylan Klebold had planned the attack for months before opening fire in the suburban high school, killing 12 classmates and a teacher and wounding about two dozen others.

"The killers had free reign in the library to kill and maim," said Dale Todd, whose son, Evan, was wounded. He said he expects to file a lawsuit today.

Klebold's parents, Thomas and Susan Klebold, also have filed a notice of intent to sue, claiming the sheriff's officials should have alerted them to Harris' violent tendencies.

The Shoels' lawsuit notes that the parents of another student told sheriff's deputies Harris operated a Web site that included threats of terrorism and threats against individuals.

They contended deputies failed to notify school officials or the parents of Harris and Klebold.

If the defendants had taken these steps, "the chain of events that led directly to the assault ... would have been interrupted and this tragedy would not have occurred," their lawsuit states.

NSync posters line the walls of Brea Hoambrecker's Ford Hall room. Hoambrecker, sophomore in pre-nursing, said Justin Timberlake is her favorite NSync member, and she has so many pictures and posters of him, they won't fit on her wall.

Sold-out NSync concert sends KSU sophomore home in tears

STORY BY SARAH MCCAFFREY ■ PHOTOS BY REED DUNN

Fans are willing to do just about anything to get their hands on NSync tickets.

The NSync concert scheduled to take place Kansas City, Mo., sold out in less than 30 minutes, leaving dismayed fans and one K-State student without tickets.

"They raffled off numbers, and we stood in line for about an hour," Brea Hoambrecker, sophomore in pre-nursing, said. "Then we had to wait another hour before they said they were sold out. I went home and I cried."

Chantal Bedell, KCHZ-FM 95.7 Kansas City morning show co-host and promotions director, said people go to extremes just to see the group in concert.

"One girl was willing to soak herself in bleach for 10 hours to get these tickets," Bedell said. "People show up in the parking lot and call in trying to get tickets."

Bedell said even though many boy-band fans are teen-age girls, it is not limited.

"The boy bands appeal to the younger crowd, but I've had mothers that like them," Bedell said. "We have pregnant women running around after tickets."

"We had a scavenger hunt at Town Center Plaza and one in North Kansas City. The turnout was very odd. Kids come from everywhere. It's our most popular giveaway."

Just Plain Dave, morning radio host and operations manager for Z95.7, said parents and boyfriends call into the radio station trying to win tickets for their daughters or girlfriends.

Hoambrecker said she thinks all boy-band fans are not female. She said it could be due in part to the evolution of the group and its new album, "No Strings Attached."

"Their new CD is more versatile, and I think more guys can get into it," she said.

Manhattan fans in search of NSync tickets don't have to go to Kansas City and participate in a contest to get their hands on them.

Bradley Jay, program and music director for KQLA-FM 103.5, said the station has a pair of tickets, but he isn't sure how they will give them away.

Brown said Z95.7 also has front row tickets that it's trying to decide how to give away. When the Backstreet Boys came to town, the station auctioned off a pair of tickets for $4,200 and gave the proceeds to the Dream Factory.

Even though Hoambrecker hasn't been able to get tickets for the Kansas City show, she does have tickets to see the group in Denver.

"We're going to see them in Denver, and a friend is going to get us tickets for Kansas City," she said. "We wanted to go to St. Louis, too, but they're sold out."

Hoambrecker said she thinks NSync has many fans who are afraid to admit they like the group.

"I think there's a lot of NSync closet fans," she said.

Hoambrecker said her favorite NSync member is Justin Timberlake.

"I had a dream that we went out on a date," she said. "The next morning I woke up, and it felt so real.

"I found Justin's phone numbers and found out where he lives. I sent him a letter every day for 30 days, but he didn't reply."

Although she likes the other bands such as Backstreet Boys and 98 Degrees, Hoambrecker said she thinks there is something that sets NSync apart from the other boy bands.

"They've had to work harder than the Backstreet Boys," she said. "It didn't just fall into their laps. They're nicer and more genuine."

Although it hasn't happened yet, Hoambrecker said she is sure she'll get to meet the man of her dreams.

"I have an advantage over his other fans because I'm about 6 years older than most of them," she said. "I'm going to marry Justin Timberlake."

Compact-disc scratches now can be repaired

By CASSIDY HILL
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

Overplaying favorite compact discs, digital video discs and Sony Playstation games, along with poor handling, can cause deep scratches that makes the music and picture continuously skip or blur.

The Complete Music Professional DJ Service has a machine that can actually remove scratches from any disc, making the old ones like new.

Jerry Becker, equipment manager for Complete Music Professional DJ Service, said the machine, called the CD Repair Man, can take scratches off of discs.

"With the help of the CD Repair Man, old scratched CDs, DVDs and Sony Playstation games become new again," Becker said. "This machine takes off the original bottom of any disc and replaces it with a new one without hurting or touching the music and picture."

A CD has four main layers, a top graphic layer, which is where the label of the CD is printed; a second lacquer layer, which is a protective layer; a third reflective layer; and a final plastic layer.

The information that allows for music and movies to play is located on the top of the plastic layer. If any of the top-three layers are damaged, this causes the CD or DVD to skip or stop all together and cannot be repaired.

Becker said the label is the worse to scratch because it can't be repaired, but said most other scratches can be fixed.

"The worse thing is to scratch the label of a disc, because it can't be repaired, but scratches on a disc are most likely to be located on the bottom of the plastic, or on the bottom of the disc," Becker said. "If there are scratches here, our CD Repair Man can fix those scratches to make the disc new again."

"These CDs were so scratched that if I hadn't taken them to their store, I would have thrown them away."

—Meagan Heinen, K-State graduate in communication sciences and disorders

Becker said because the machine has not been around long, few people know about its existence. He said the machine was given exposure at a demonstration in Bramlage Coliseum.

"Our CD Repair Man has been around for nearly a year but many people don't even know that it exists," Becker said. "At Bramlage, I scratched CDs on the floor in front of students and then placed the scratched CDs in the CD Repair Man to show students how our machine really takes the scratches out of discs."

Meagan Heinen, K-State graduate in communication sciences and disorders, said she was amazed with the technology and how it quickly repaired her discs.

"I took CDs that were so scratched that they played music for only 30 seconds and then would begin to skip to Complete Music Professional DJ Service," Heinen said. "These CDs were so scratched that if I hadn't taken them to their store, I would have thrown them away."

Heinen said she didn't expect such good results.

"I was shocked at the results. My CDs now play like they are brand new," Heinen said. "The price to repair my CDs was also very cheap."

Becker said the repair rate is $4 for a music CD and $7 for all other discs. He said discounts are available for customers with a bulk of discs needing repairs.

Tom Mahoney, owner of Game Guy, said Complete Music returns his video games and DVDs quickly, and he has never been dissatisfied with its services.

"Complete Music has a great turnaround time, they always return our video games and DVDs back to us quickly," Mahoney said.

"I am always 100-percent satisfied with their work."

Coco, Ollie and other chimpanzees live across from them.

Some lay face down on the floor, lazily glancing at two chimps up near the roof, where one is scratching the other's butt.

A short walk brings the visitor to the amur leopards, which are about the size of a large dog.

Sergi, the male, is the docile one. He stretches himself out on the green grass, but always keeps an eye open for his female leopard friend, whom Nemecek described as aggressive.

These two cats, however, are over-powered and over-sized by their neighbors — two white tigers.

Nemecek runs his fingers outside Raja's cage, trying to make him jump or at least show his fangs, to no avail. Rana, however, is more willing.

She bounds into the air several times, coming close to the top of her cage. For this reason, the top is bent slightly down and protected by an electric wire.

Another short walk down the winding sidewalk provides the visitor the opportunity to see cougars. They were once someone's pet, but were given to the zoo after they got too big.

To demonstrate their strength, Nemecek places a big plastic broom next to a side of their cage accessible only to zoo staff.

Omega, one of the three cougars, immediately pounces on it, forcing her paws and uncovered claws through the cage. She drags half of the broom in, but despite the battle, she eventually loses it to the curator.

She then fastens her fangs on the cage and rattles it, all the while glaring at him. The baboons across from her, however, are in a better mood.

Frank, Jesse and Douglas scamper up and down the tree and swing crazily on the ropes. Frank pauses for a brief moment to munch on some food, but then Jesse comes up behind him and off they go again. Douglas, the older baboon, sits quietly on a rock with a disapproving look.

The tour of the zoo isn't even halfway done. There is still the reptile room, which houses Roni, the Burmese python, and an iguana the length of a park bench. There are still the kangaroos to see, one of whom carries around a joey too big for her pouch — its legs stick out uncomfortably around its head.

Next are the rhinos, who are consuming copious amounts of hay. Nemecek calls out to them, and some approach the edge of their cage — their rough hide rubbing against their cage while their horns bob up and down.

The giraffes, the macaws, the capuchins and the transcasian urals are also at the zoo. But the funniest ones are the black bears, if only for their names: Bo and Jangles.

The reserve gets these animals from other zoos mostly and some from the global breeding program.

"It's kind of computerized, interactive dating," Kathy Tolbert, the reserve's assistant director, said.

Tolbert said the reserve's biggest expense is the fresh fruit and vegetables it has to buy for animals.

Because Rolling Hills Reserve is a non-profit organization and receives no tax money, it depends on donations. Before it opened, 92 percent of the donations came from Walker.

Brown, however, said he hopes this will change.

"That is our goal, to pay our own way," he said.

The reserve has a staff of 40, none of whom have a zoological background.

"Everyone is local and they all received in-house training," Tolbert said. "It's been nice because we've been able to grow together."

Should an unusual problem with one of the animals arise, Brown said they can contact a professional through the Internet and get some answers.

The reserve is also working on an additional 40 acres, where a museum and a gorilla and mixed-African exhibit will be built. The reserve also hopes to bring in three new species: a giant anteater, an aardvark and cheetahs.

One of the unusual buildings within the zoo is the gift shop, which was originally a late 1800s railway depot built in Tescott, Kan.

There is also a restaurant and a refuge tram where guests can listen to a narrated ride.

Brown's favorite part, however, is the interaction between people and animals.

"Whether it's a 10-year old child or a 96-year old lady looking at the gorilla, when you see them smiling to each other, it does something to between the bachelor degree and the next phase of a student's academic career.

SCHOLARSHIP

"This award is to be exclusively used for educational opportunities that are not in this country," Kolonosky said. "The competition is quite competitive because we compete with many schools with the Ivy League and Big Ten. The competition can become quite steep."

Kolonosky said students who receive the Fulbright receive about $15,000 in the respective country's currency that goes toward their transportation, university tuition and room and board. He also said a stipend is usually included.

The Fulbright Scholarship program was proposed to the United States Congress in 1945 by Sen. J. William Fulbright. It was approved and signed into law in 1946. Kolonosky said between 400 to 600 scholarships are awarded each year and the application process is long and drawn out.

"Students must submit their transcripts, three letters of recommendations, and they also have the opportunity to develop what they want to do and accomplish abroad," Kolonosky said. "They have to do a little homework about the institution where they want to study and how they will develop their research project. They are both student and scholar."

Hauck said after he submitted his application in October, he waited for a recommendation from both the university and then the Institute of International Education. The recommendation then has to be approved by both the United States and the host country — in this case, Mexico.

Kolonosky said universities receive notification of winners late in the semester because of the number of applications committees and governments have to sort through.

"Kevin has already received notification from the Mexican government, but some students do not find out until much later in the semester if they are recipients," Kolonosky said. "It is not only a reflection of the university because if students can get the education they need to make them competitive nationally, it shows a lot for K-State."

"He was always grinning, and when he was grinning I knew he was listening," Pesci said.

The impromptu committee that planned the service moved quickly once the news was out and was student-driven, Pesci said.

"It's our student leaders," he said. "People we haven't seen a lot of leadership out of are standing up and saying, 'I want to do this. I want to do that.' It's not one of those things where you had to push anyone at all."

Pesci said family members who survive Golay, both parents and his younger brother, also wanted to attend the memorial, because it will help them see his college life.

"I think things like this always bring people together," Nelson said.

Nelson said donations also can be made in Golay's name to the Darin Golay Memorial Scholarship Fund, designed to help his brother through college.

Donations can be sent in care of Garand Funeral Home, 412 N. 7th St. Garden City, Kan. 67846

Congressman requests investigation into funding of U.S. aid programs

By LIBBY QUAID
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — It's one of Kansas Rep. Todd Tiahrt's biggest accomplishments in Congress: blocking U.S. aid to overseas governments that force women to be sterilized, have abortions or use contraceptives.

Now Tiahrt and two colleagues are seeking an investigation into whether such human rights violations persist in U.S.-funded programs, and a watchdog group says the 1998 legislation needs more teeth.

At issue are programs that bribe women to be sterilized, coerce them to use contraceptives or require health care providers to provide a set number of sterilizations.

Peru — singled out as an egregious example when Congress passed the legislation — again is accused of forcing women to be sterilized against their will or offering food or free medical treatment to women who agree to use contraceptives.

"It has also been alleged that at least one woman was injected with Depo-Provera during her pregnancy, resulting in a miscarriage, and that targets and incentives are being imposed on family planning service providers," Tiahrt wrote the U.S. Agency for International Development late last month in a letter also signed by Reps. Tom Coburn, R-Okla., and Chris Smith, R-N.J.

Tiahrt, a conservative Republican, was referring to a report by Population Research Institute, of Front Royal, Va., one of the chief supporters of the 1998 amendment.

PRI sent investigators to Peru last year to interview alleged victims and later issued a report that is disturbing lawmakers on Capitol Hill.

"Americans would be concerned if a foreign government were running sterilization campaigns in urban centers on America's poorest citizens," PRI spokesman Scott Weinberg said.

"Since the signing of the Tiahrt amendment, we've found that it is relatively easy to obtain credible testimony from women who report that their human rights have been abused, certainly in Peru, and we have reports of exactly the same thing from Kenya and Tanzania," he said.

In the Dominican Republic, one of the country's most respected leaders, Cardinal Nicolas de Jesus Lopez Rodriguez, angrily referred to U.S.-funded international organizations as death squads after hearing that the wife of new U.S. ambassador Charles Manatt said she was pleased at the number of sterilizations there.

The U.S. Embassy has said the comments, made during a visit to a health clinic that receives U.S. aid, were distorted and that she only expressed gratitude that U.S. dollars contributed to the health of the local population.

A Washington spokeswoman for U.S. AID, Kim Walz, said the agency has begun an investigation and "takes any allegation of abuse in any of our family planning programs seriously."

"AID has never provided any assistance in any form to sterilization campaigns, and we've also warned our contractors not to support the campaign," she said.

Microsoft to produce new organizers

By MICHAEL J. MARTINEZ
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

SEATTLE — Microsoft Corp. believes handheld organizers should do much more than organize, and the company and its partners now are betting millions on a direct challenge to the Palm computer.

The software giant and three computer manufacturers are set to announce a new generation of handheld organizers Wednesday that not only will keep appointments and organize phone numbers, but also will play music, record sound, balance checkbooks and surf the Internet.

The Pocket PC represents Microsoft's third try at building a successful handheld device, a market the company has invested millions of dollars in with disappointing results. This time, Microsoft believes its device will give market leader Palm Computing Inc. a run for its money.

"People joke that it takes Microsoft until version three to get something right," said Ben Waldman, Microsoft's vice president in charge of mobile services. "Well, this is version three and we got it right."

In addition to a datebook, calendar, calculator and memo pad, the Pocket PC will include a slimmed-down but useable version of Internet Explorer, an e-book reader that uses ClearType technology to make it easy on the eyes, a digital voice recorder, and a Windows Media Player for music and video files.

With additional plug-in hardware, the various models — built by Compaq Computer Corp., Hewlett-Packard Co. and Casio Computer Co. — also will support wireless Internet connections and have additional memory storage.

Priced between $499 and $599, the Pocket PCs are at the high end of the market for handhelds that synchronize with personal computers, a concept first introduced by Palm in March 1996. The Palm IIIc, the first Palm organizer to include a color screen, sells for about $449.

"We're still a little high, but we give a little extra functionality," said Steve Ballmer, Microsoft's president and chief executive. "I feel very good about where we are with this."

On the new Pocket PCs, the interface looks more like Palm's, complete with larger icons and fewer pull-down menus. Most functions are accessed with a single touch. Battery life has improved somewhat as well.

There still are some technical issues with the Pocket PC. Some Palm customers might have trouble transferring data from older Palm organizers to the new Pocket PCs. Microsoft executives said the biggest plus for the Pocket PC is that it can run a number of programs simultaneously. For example, a user can listen to MP3 music files, play a video game and look up a phone number at the same time.

While the Palm IIIc offers a color screen, few other improvements were made to the basic Palm software. The Palm VII, also $449, has a built-in wireless Internet connection, but only allows for limited access to a handful of Web sites.

Palm Computing, recently spun off from 3Com Corp., has no public plans to substantially improve its hardware or software. That could be a serious problem as other hardware companies continue to meld personal organizers with digital music players, pagers and cellular phones.

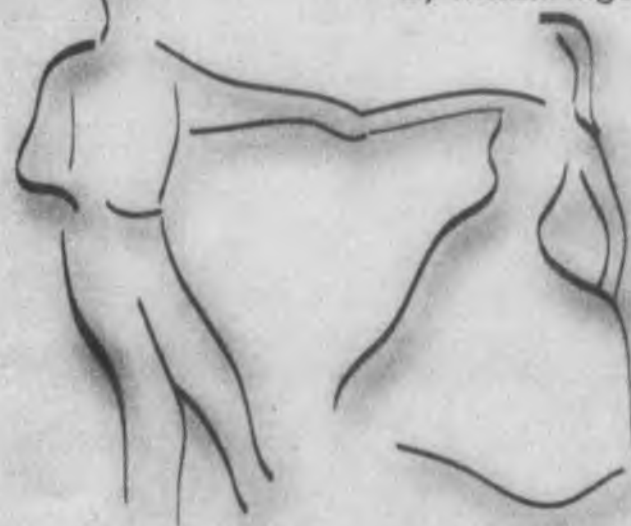

"Palm ought to be running scared," said Michael Gartenberg, a senior analyst with the Gartner Group. "They haven't shown a clear path to include this kind of functionality."

SGA Executive Committee awaits Senate's approval

BY ANGELA KISTNER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Student Governing Association Executive Committee has been chosen for the 2000-2001 year pending approval by Student Senate tonight.

Senate Chair Travis Lenkner, with the help of Senate Vice Chair Lance Stafford and Office of Student Activities and Services coordinator Gayle Spencer, selected the eight chairs out of 18 applicants.

Lenkner said one factor considered when appointing the Executive Committee was leadership.

"This is a small group of people that has the position to affect a lot of change, and we want to make sure we maximize that," he said.

Although experience wasn't a deciding factor in the appointments, Lenkner said it was important.

"All the committee chairs are people who have been involved not only in SGA but other campus activities," he said. "They know the system and have worked their way up to this point."

One chair is familiar with his committee, as he was reappointed to his position from last term.

Ryan Walker, sophomore in family studies and human services and the only reappointed chair, said he reapplied for the privilege fee chair because he has a big interest in student finances.

"I want to make sure those are spent responsibly," he said.

Walker said he learned a lot last year, and now there are some things he would like to change to improve the process.

Lenkner said Walker did a great job last during last year's challenges that saw big privilege fees up for review.

"This is the year we can go do a lot of things above and beyond the normal Privilege Fee Committee, because we have someone returning," he said. "Now, we can go about doing some of the things we've always wanted to do."

Brownback, sophomore in biochemistry and pre-medicine, is new to the executive committee but isn't new to SGA. Brownback was an arts and sciences senator during the 1999-2000 term and served on the Privilege Fee Committee, and he was a Senate intern his freshman year and served on the Governmental Relations Committee.

Brownback said one of his goals is to have a diverse Academic Affairs and University Relations Committee with different ideas. Another one of his goals as chair is to look into fall break again.

"I'm possibly looking into an all-university survey over fall break to

FRIENDS, FAMILY SAY GOODBYE

He brought an extra bag of Doritos. Not that he had to bring one, but after all, his friend had wanted some of his Doritos the day before.

This generosity and friendliness was what people remembered about Darin Golay, senior in hotel and restaurant management.

Golay died in a car crash April 9 in Pawnee County, and more than 60 people attended his memorial service Wednesday afternoon.

"He'd give money, time, anything to help anybody out," Ryan Meng, junior in criminology, said. "He was very loyal to friends and family."

Meng met Golay while playing flag football in fifth grade. Although Meng remembered how small Golay was in sixth grade, he also remembered Golay's generosity and loyalty.

The thing that sticks out in his mind the most was how Golay, despite going to bed at 2 a.m. sometimes, always would get up around 6 a.m. to practice with K-State's women's basketball team.

"That showed how committed he was to things in his life," Meng said.

Nicki Ramage, senior in media relations and a basketball player, said she remembers not only his dedication but his effort to get to know the team.

"He was the most energetic, non-stop guy you could ever meet," she said. "He was one of those people you meet once and it's like you've known him."

"Carpe diem" is the phrase Deb Patterson, K-State's women basketball coach, used to characterize Golay.

Not only was he an example, but truly a gift, she said.

"He brought with him an energy, happiness, vibrancy, intensity and friendliness that told you he was there to seize the moment," she said. "Every day he would walk into that gym, he made us better. ... He brought us up."

Golay also had other gifts, particularly that of making friends.

He would sit in class with his basketball hat turned backwards and a little grin on his face, said Patrick Pesci, program director for hotel and restaurant management.

"Darin was a giver," Pesci said. "He gave his time and energy to others in the program."

He also would work his schedule around

Brownback to visit K-State this morning

By JENN DAVOREN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Sen. Sam Brownback will visit K-State today in order to recruit Kansas farmers in the fight against global warming.

Brownback will speak at a 10 a.m. news conference at the K-State Agronomy Research Farm. He will be promoting a bill that would provide farmers with monetary rewards for practicing carbon sequestration.

The matter of carbon sequestration, the act of putting carbon back into the soil, has become important due to the belief that global warming partially is caused by rising levels of carbon dioxide in the atmosphere.

"It protects carbon in the soil and preserves it, keeping it from going into the atmosphere," said Chuck Rice, professor of agronomy.

K-State is a good stage for Brownback's conference, due to the university's involvement in carbon sequestration projects, such as the use of minimum tillage and no-till cropping, Rice said. These practices, which would cause little to no disturbance of the carbon stored in soil, will help in the reduction of greenhouse gas buildup it is hoped.

Other possibilities that K-State researchers are exploring include crop rotation, better management of range lands and the growth of crops that could pour carbon back into soil, Rice said.

"This is a win-win situation, because if we can store more carbon into the soil, it benefits the air and the soil," he said. "Putting more carbon in the soil improves production and also improves water quality."

Local teacher declares run for Legislature

By DANICA COTO
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A Manhattan High School science teacher is doing his fair share of homework, too.

Dean Stamel, a Democrat, said he will run against incumbent Rep. Jeff Peterson, R-Manhattan for the 66th district seat in the Kansas Legislature.

Stamel has been reading newspapers and documents from Topeka to prepare for the upcoming election.

"Believe it or not, it's something I've wanted to do for a long time. I've always been fascinated by government and politics," he said. "I've always wondered how I'd go about it."

Some Manhattan residents encouraged him to run, but Stamel said he was hesitant at first.

He was busy enough with school work, and the money was not an incentive, he said.

"My first instinct was to say no, but the more I thought about it, the more I wanted to do it," he said.

Stamel's background also gave him confidence to run for this position: He's been president of the local teacher's association three times and has negotiated teachers' contracts for 10 years.

This has given him the advantage of being involved with the Legislature in Topeka and watching that process for years, he said.

"I think it's time to get more of a moderate or less conservative representative down there to get more things done for people," he said.

Stamel wants to listen to the ideas of other people, listen to their debate and make the best decision that will benefit the largest amount of people.

"Most decisions aren't made that way," he said.

One of the issues he wants to address is health concerns.

"We may have the best health coverage in the world, but not the best access to it," he said.

Another issue is education funding, but above all,

Unattended candle to blame for late-night house fire

By REED DUNN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Most of Annette Cessna's belongings were lost Wednesday evening in a fire at 403 S. 18th St.

Cessna, junior in pre-journalism and mass communications, had fallen asleep on the couch while a candle was left burning in her bedroom.

Battalion Chief Jerry Snyder said it was this candle in the main-level bedroom that was the cause of the fire.

"A candle left burning on a dresser ignited a tapestry on the wall," he said.

Smoke from the fire woke Cessna, who ran across the street for a neighbor to call 911. The Manhattan Fire Department received the call at 9:31 p.m.

"I didn't hear the smoke detector," Cessna said. "The smoke detector didn't go off."

Snyder said the door was left open when Cessna fled the home, causing damages to the exterior.

"There are damages from heat and smoke throughout the first level. Most of their personal belongings are lost," Snyder said.

Damages to the lower level of the home were limited to smoke and water damages, Snyder said.

Jenica Loether, junior in family studies and human services, was coming home from work and realized the fire was at her home as she followed fire engines up the street.

"It was just kind of a shock, I guess," Loether said. "It just didn't seem real."

Loether and Cessna have lived in the main level of the house since August with Jeremy Merritt, junior in open-option, who also was at work at the time of the fire. The owner of the home, Dan Stevens, junior in open-option, lives in the basement but was on campus when the fire broke out.

"My roommate was down in the basement taking a shower, and he came to the school and got me," Stevens said.

Snyder said this is the second fire in Manhattan this week caused by leaving a candle unattended. The cost of damage still is undetermined.

Jeremy Merritt, junior in open-option, and Annette Cessna, junior in pre-journalism and mass communications, watch as Manhattan firefighters finish inspecting their house at 403 S. 18th St.

Murder suspect found dead in vehicle owned by wife

KANSAS CITY, Kan. — A man who was a suspect in a double murder was found shot to death behind the wheel of his wife's car.

Robert M. Diaz Jr., 24, was found dead about 10:10 p.m. Monday.

The Wyandotte County district attorney's office dismissed two first-degree murder charges against Diaz and another man March 9, after a key witness failed to attend a scheduled preliminary hearing.

District Attorney Nick Tomasic said Tuesday that the key witness had not been found, and the murder charges probably would not be refiled soon.

Diaz and Donta E. Hill, 25, had been charged in the Sept. 22 slayings of Eshe King, 20, and Stacey Wilson, 24. Police believe the women were not the intended victims and that gunmen were looking for a man who knew them.

Police Sgt. Henry Callahan said Tuesday that so far it does not look as if retaliation was the motive for Diaz's killing.

Police found shell casings and contraband inside the car, but they would not elaborate. No murder weapon was found.

School board votes to fire basketball coach Monday

OSAGE CITY, Kan. — A high school girls' basketball coach accused of inappropriately touching and making comments to female students has been fired.

Kent Reed said Tuesday he would appeal the Osage City school board's decision to fire him.

Reed, a teacher and a counselor at Osage City High School, has been suspended with pay since Dec. 20.

The board's 6-0 vote to fire him on Monday was based on six accusations including allegedly touching female students' thighs, knees and legs, making comments on their physical appearance and bodies, and discussing a sexual fantasy with a female student.

Reed, who denies the allegations, will be paid until his current contract ends, said Stephen Jones, the school district's attorney.

After the board made its decision Monday, female students hugged each other — and some cried — outside the board office.

"I'm very glad about the outcome," said Anne Boss, the mother of a 17-year-old female student. "It's been a long couple of months. It's been hard on our family and hard on our town. I'm glad this part is over."

Reed did not attend Monday's meeting.

Reed previously had been the school's athletic director and has been the Indians' head coach since 1983.

According to the school's Web site, he has a 221-135 overall record at Osage City.

His teams have gone to the state tournament three times, and Reed received a commendation from the Kansas Basketball Coaches Association two years ago after getting his 300th career victory.

Reed has 340 career wins.

Software bug keeps users from their Internet service

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Hundreds of thousands of Southwestern Bell Internet service customers in five states were unable to get online Tuesday and Wednesday after a software bug disabled the company's system.

Dial-up customers in Kansas, Missouri, Oklahoma, Texas and Arkansas were affected when the service initially crashed about 2:15 p.m. Tuesday, Southwestern Bell spokesman Chris Talley said.

It remained down until 2:30 a.m. Wednesday after engineers worked through the night to get the system back up, company spokeswoman Ellen Pantanius said.

The service crashed again about 9 a.m. Wednesday, she said, affecting customers in Texas.

But engineers had the glitch fixed by 11:30 a.m.

The problem occurred when a bug appeared in the operating system software used to authenticate users.

Southwestern Bell Internet Services is one of the 10 largest Internet service providers in the country, Talley said.

CLARIFICATIONS & corrections

There were errors in Wednesday's Collegian.

Gen. Augusto Pinochet is the former Chilean dictator.

In the truck-motorcycle accident Tuesday night, the truck was traveling east on Claflin, turning north across the intersection onto Denison. The motorcycle was traveling west through the intersection.

The Collegian regrets these errors.

Serious about horsing around

Sophomore rider earns spot in May 12 national competition

By JUSTIN SCHUSTER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Kelly Gratny spent a lot of time with animals growing up.

Her father is a horse trainer, and she lived on a farm outside of Leavenworth, Kan.

"I've pretty much grown up living and breathing horses," said Gratny, sophomore in pre-veterinary medicine and microbiology.

Gratny has used her background to make K-State history. She has become the first member of K-State's new equestrian club to qualify for national competition.

Nationals will take place May 12-14 at Conyers Horse Park in Atlanta, Gratny said.

Riders in the open horseman-ship category of the western division, for which Gratny has qualified, compete in two different areas: railwork and execution of a pattern.

Gratny said railwork consists of performing three rhythms of movement for horses — walking, trotting and cantering. Judges then ask the riders to execute a certain pattern, which includes typical riding maneuvers.

"It's judged strictly on how you ride and handle your horse," she said.

Gratny began her journey to national competition by qualifying for regionals. In her open division, which boasts the most advanced riders, competitors need to accumulate 28 points at shows throughout the season.

"I was right at 28," Gratny said. "I had to win my class the last day, and luckily, I had a good horse."

She said many other riders on her team would have qualified for regionals if they had started participating in shows earlier in the season.

"We had quite a few members who were close to qualifying," Gratny said.

The top-three regional riders go on to zones, the next level of competition, she said. Gratny won the regional competition in her class.

"It was an experience for us, because it was our first trip," Gratny said.

Gratny said she then traveled to the Zone 7 competition. She placed second in her class, which earned her a spot at the national competition.

Zone 7 consists of teams from Regions 1 and 2. K-State belongs to Region 2 along with all universities from Oklahoma, Texas and Louisiana. Region 1 has teams from all schools in Colorado, New Mexico and Wyoming, as well as Colby Community College, Gratny said.

"Zones were very successful for our region," Gratny said. "We were very excited about that, because Colorado State University has a very reputable program, and New Mexico State University has been the high-point team in the nation for the past two years."

Teresa Douthit, the intercollegiate horseshow equestrian club coach, said Gratny had an excellent horse for her first railwork and pattern round.

"I was pretty confident that she would qualify," Douthit said.

However, she said that after the competition, while the riders were all lined up, the judges asked the competitors to get off their horses and get on the horse next to them to do railwork.

Douthit said the judges simply wanted to see how well the riders could adjust to a new horse.

The second horse that Gratny had to ride was the worst horse at the competition, Douthit said.

"He was being awful," she said. "I was a bit concerned."

Nevertheless, Gratny succeeded in qualifying for the national competition.

Douthit said she knows Gratny will represent K-State's team well at nationals.

EVAN SEMON/COLLEGIAN

Kelly Gratny, sophomore in pre-veterinary medicine and microbiology, has become the first competitor on K-State's new equestrian club to qualify for national competition.

At nationals, Gratny said there will be 14 riders in her class, which includes female as well as male riders. Her competition will take place May 12.

"I would like to be in the top three there," Gratny said. "We'll see what happens."

Janelle McAuley, sophomore in pre-veterinary medicine and member of the equestrian team, said Gratny's qualifying for nationals shows that their team is competitive.

"I think it's awesome, and I can't wait to see how she does at nationals," McAuley said. "I think she's a really great rider."

Julie Wolf, the intercollegiate horseshow association adviser for K-State, said Gratny drives the other team members to excel and do their best.

"I think that Kelly brings a lot of spirit, hard work and dedication to the team," Wolf said. "She's really a team leader."

Gratny said for the team to be more competitive next year, it needs more participation.

"We have the quality, we were just short on numbers," Gratny said. "We need beginning riders."

Douthit said that next year the team will have strong veteran leadership and will know better how to prepare for the shows.

"I think we have a strong foundation to build on," Douthit said. "This year was a learning experience, next year we'll know better what we're doing."

Memorial to be restored for anniversary of Columbine deaths

By STEVE GUTTERMAN
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

LITTLETON, Colo. — The carpenter who last year erected wooden crosses for the 15 victims of the Columbine High School massacre returned to Colorado to restore the memorial as mourners prepared to mark today's anniversary of the tragedy.

Greg Zanis wanted to honor the families of the victims, said his wife, Susan, in an interview from their Aurora, Ill., home.

His truck carried 13 crosses this time, in deference to one victim's parents who had torn down the two crosses representing the two student gunmen. Both boys committed suicide after the rampage.

The April 20, 1999, massacre was the worst school shooting in U.S. history, and it affected thousands of people worldwide who watched on television as police circled the building and terrified students fled the school, including one seen dropping from a library window.

At nearby Clement Park, where the crosses were erected after the slayings, workers unloaded orange-and-white barricades Wednesday in anticipation of thousands of mourners at a public memorial service and a candlelight vigil planned today.

Elsewhere, victims' families organized memorial services to mark the day, and officials prepared for a statewide moment of silence.

The school itself remains off-limits to the public.

Davadas Moses, a doctor from Loma Linda, Calif., in Denver on business, tried to reach it Wednesday but was turned back by security.

"I just wanted to get a sense of it in my own mind," Moses said as he walked through Clement Park.

Many survivors, still coping with their grief, planned to stay away from the services and the Littleton area today.

Columbine's attendance has dropped this week, with 263 of 1,885 students absent Tuesday, school district spokeswoman Marilyn Saltzman said. Attendance was way down Wednesday, but figures were not available by midafternoon.

"Most of the people I've talked to are trying to get as far away from this place as possible — the ones who were actually there," said Karen Nielsen, who was working in the cafeteria when the first shots rang out.

Kim Blair, a Columbine senior who saw her friend Anne Marie Hochhalter wounded, said she planned to spend the anniversary with her family in a hotel.

"Everybody I know is going up to the mountains or trying to get away for the day at least," Blair said. "For some, it's an emotional thing. Last year was so horrifying that they just can't be anywhere near that place at that time."

Still, officials expected a good number of students at the private assembly. Classes are canceled for the day, and attendance is not mandatory. Teddy bears sent in the wake of the shootings were to be set out for students to take if they want.

Gov. Bill Owens planned to lead a public service at the Capitol in downtown Denver, including a statewide moment of silence at 12:21 p.m., the time the attack began.

Darrell Scott, whose daughter Rachel was killed, was to lead a service at a nearby church that is expected to draw about 2,000 people, including victims' families. Other services were planned at nearby churches and the gravesides of some victims.

Nate Wooten, a freshman skateboarding during a break Wednesday, said there was little talk about the anniversary among Columbine students.

"They care. I know that," said his friend Brad Bootsma, a sophomore. "I guess they're just trying to go on with their lives. I know I am."

School anti-violence programs promote fear

High schools have become a scary place.

On the first anniversary of the shooting at Columbine High School in Littleton, Colo., that claimed 15 lives — including those of the two gunmen — changes are evident in schools across the state and the nation. However, many of those changes have contributed to a sense of fear rather than eased it.

Certainly, fear of another massacre is cause for alarm and precautions. However, it does not justify harming students who have done nothing to warrant being injured.

In response to the Columbine shooting — along with the rash of shootings that occurred both before and after Columbine — many schools have taken drastic actions.

Backpacks are banned from many schools.

Coats cannot be worn indoors.

Metal detectors have been installed both to detect weapons and frighten students from bringing them in the first place.

Hotlines have been set up in many states — including Kansas — that permit students to call in and report any threats of violence made by their classmates.

These precautions are not outrageous. They do, however, combine to create an atmosphere that is even more frightening than before, and certainly not conducive to learning.

The real problem is evident with more radical programs. North Carolina, for example, has set up a program that permits students to phone in odd behavior by classmates — basically, to rat out friends who play Quake, wear trench coats or don't participate in mainstream activities.

This simply is going too far. It allows students to be investigated for being different.

They are punished for crimes they have not and probably would not have committed.

In this era when schools obviously are dangerous, safety should be the No. 1 concern. However, school administrators should not panic and take unnecessary actions.

By doing so, they only are contributing to the culture of fear in today's high schools.

Hazing in greek houses will end with guidance

Editor,
Wednesday's editorial, "Fraternity presidents need to set strong precedents," is an overblown opinion on a subject that apparently you know little about.

Hazing is a problem in the greek community. However, if you check the university's definition of hazing, you will find a variety of actions that are considered hazing. They range from keeping a pledge awake past midnight to beating someone near death. Obviously, these are two extremes, but you can see how even a seemingly harmless prank, like changing a password on a person's computer, can border between hazing and friends horsing around.

It's this variability in the allegations that causes the Interfraternity Council to have to look at each case individually. Each case will differ, so each punishment should differ. Hazing will be almost unavoidable; it is the serious violations that need to be abolished.

The punishment for Acacia might have been shortened, but the effects remain. I was an active member of Acacia for only one year before we were shut down. I will graduate — as will most remaining members — before the house will reopen. I will miss the opportunities and experiences for which I joined. So the punishment still was quite stiff.

The new alumni support is great and is something every fraternity needs. With guidance from alumni, hazing can be minimized. The presidents made a sound decision based on good judgment. Other fraternities will learn — if they already don't know — that sanctions can be devastating.

Hazing is wrong and will be stopped. It will just take time.

SPANKING

not necessarily abuse

Some parents effectively discipline children through spanking, while others go too far

Who would have guessed that in Comparative Politics class we would discuss spanking?

Although it is not a topic on which our professor will test us, he did use the opportunity to spark debate. His goal was to make us think; so, I am.

First, I thought of my past. My parents, like many of yours, used spanking. As a woman in my politics class pointed out, many parents do not use spanking. Her words were, "I wasn't spanked, and I turned out just fine."

Well, good for her parents and good for her. But, what about my children?

During the past 15 years, spanking has become politically incorrect. Parents have been told repeatedly by parenting magazines that spanking children will result in harmful psychological and physical problems throughout their adulthood.

Author Arno Gruen wrote about children who were spanked in "The Need to Punish: Political Consequences of Identifying with the Aggressor."

He wrote: "Children who hate their own nature can respect themselves only if they can direct their hatred outward. If they disown their individuality as something foreign, they are compelled to find enemies in order to preserve the causes of their own victimization; they also deny that they are victims. By making other people their victims, they are perpetuating the process. But they must deny their own victimization, because otherwise the earlier experiences of the terror accompanying it would re-emerge. No child, including the threatened one within us, can stand up to this terror."

Essentially, Gruen is saying those of us who were spanked are unable to cope and will be physically harmful to people around us. We also will refuse to acknowledge that we were victims.

He is wrong on both accounts. I never have been physically harmful to anyone. I also was not a victim. This statement seems to substantiate his belief that I, as a spanked child, would deny my victimization. However, I am grown, married, not dependent on my parents who used to spank me, at times even critical of a few of their parenting practices, and of sound mind. Therefore, I clearly can state that I was not a victim.

I do believe in correctly used spanking. Spanking is not the first choice for every child. The popular time-out effectively could discipline one child and, for another, do absolutely nothing to change behavior.

I understood as a child that my parents were spanking me not as punishment, but instead as discipline. The difference between these two words is the difference between love and abuse.

The intent and effects of spanking a child, as well as the attitude of the parent, are completely different than when beating a child. In spanking (one or two swats), the intent is to correct a behavior problem. The parent decides to spank out of love and concern for the well being of a child. The effects of spanking are a changed behavior.

In an abusive situation, the purpose of a beating (repeated strikes) is to inflict physical and emotional pain through force. Abuse comes from a parent with an attitude of anger and malice. The result is emotional and physical injury that can last a lifetime.

Anti-spanking proponents will say spanking is abuse. However, surveys done at Iowa State University in 1994 indicate that 70 to 90 percent of parents of preschoolers use spanking, yet the incidence of abuse is less than 5 percent.

Statistically, the two practices are far apart. Furthermore, during the past decade, reports of child abuse steadily have risen while approval for parental spanking has decreased.

Spanking used by a caring parent can be beneficial to a child. Den A. Trumbull, M.D., wrote in Pediatrics magazine, "Spanking should be used selectively for clear, deliberate misbehavior, particularly that which arises from a child's persistent defiance of a parent's instruction. It should be used only when the child receives at least as much encouragement and praise for good behavior as correction for the problem."

Children should be forewarned of the results of misbehavior. When my parents spanked me, they did it in a private room to avoid my embarrassment. They clearly explained why I was being disciplined. After the spanking, if I was crying, they would hold me and comfort me until I gained control of myself. They reassured me they loved me, and I knew they did.

As I look back at my childhood, I can see the great benefits my parents gave to me by disciplining me in a manner that changed my behavior. I am alive because they taught me not to run out into the street. I have many friends because they taught me how to share instead of being selfish. I can love because my parents took time to teach me the value of others and myself.

As the woman in my politics class pointed out, she turned out just right without spanking. However, I needed it. I'll just have to wait and see if my children will need it.

Tax time inspires mediation upon country's benefits

DAVID LEVIN

I just finished figuring out my taxes late Sunday night (or was it early Monday morning?).

What I really find disconcerting — more than the hassle of running around Manhattan on Sunday trying to find the forms needed to keep the Internal Revenue Service from kicking down my door in the middle of the night, or the worry that there isn't enough money in my bank account after that weeklong binge we call spring break — is when I come across such statements in the tax workbook as, "You cannot take this deduction if your taxable income is greater than $100,000."

Do people really make that much dough? I wish I made 20 percent of that. What I really don't need is for my 1040A to remind me I'm not even close to being up to the poverty line. That was the reason I went on that weeklong binge in the first place. For me, the economic boom of the 1990s was just something that happened to other people.

The good thing was that, when I finished my 1040A, I owed the revenue collectors nothing. I don't get anything back, but I don't have to pay anything, either.

It's a nice feeling that I can be a member of this exclusive club we call the United States of America and not have to pay any dues.

What a deal.
I didn't have to pay for the Senate vote after President Clinton's impeachment nor the concluding bits of Kenneth Starr's investigation that ran into the scores of millions of dollars.

I didn't have to pay for any congressional votes or debates or filibusters last year.

I didn't have to pay for the watering down of current gun-control laws or amending the Constitution to ban flag desecration.

Nor did I help sponsor posting the Ten Commandments being put in every public school classroom, not as a means of forcing a particular religious view on a captive crowd, but to prevent the unlikely event of one of the students going postal on his classmates after obtaining a gun as a result of the watered-down gun bill.

Nor did I have to pay into the salaries, nor the health care, nor the retirement funds of Clinton, his Cabinet, people of congress or all their staffs.

I didn't have to pay for any of those Mars Landers that crashed and burned and all the other failed NASA projects.

I didn't have to pay for farm subsidies.

I didn't have to contribute to the Human Genome Project or any other federally funded medical research including AIDS, cancer, diabetes, heart disease, cataracts, arthritis, tuberculosis, venereal diseases and piles.

I didn't have to pay into the running of the FBI, ATF, CIA, NSA, INS, EPA nor the Secret Service for my protection. (But who's going to protect me from them?)

I didn't have to pay for the Department of Commerce or the weather service or making sure that when I buy a gallon of milk it's really a gallon of milk and not eight-tenths of a gallon of milk.

I didn't have to pay the Department of Education for education or HUD for housing.

I didn't have to pay for the military to ensure my rights and liberties, rattle my teeth from Fort Riley, nor its excursion to Kosovo including the complete replacement of every multimillion-dollar cruise missile in our arsenal and the several billion-dollar stealth bomber that was shot down. (True historical note: The Serbs were able to locate and shoot down the stealth bomber not by radar, but by the naked eye. Flying at night below cloud cover, the black stealth bomber stuck out like a sore thumb. Prior to this incident, some people had suggested that the underside of the stealth bomber be painted a baby blue so as to be camouflaged against the night clouds. This idea was rejected because black is a lot cooler color than baby blue. I didn't have to contribute to the salaries of those who wanted the bomber's underside black.)

But I still got to visit the national parks and go to the Smithsonian Institute and see the millennial celebration in front of the Lincoln Memorial and vote and bitch.

Yes, life is good.

How can the university afford to expand Ackert Hall when buildings like Dickens and Waters are going to pot?

I wanted to clear a few things up about the "Most Hated Rival" section of Tuesday's Collegian. Intense competition and rivalry exists when both of the teams win more than one game in 30 years.

The IFC got their precedent straight. They're pretty much sellouts by letting Acacia off after only one year.

Taryn Fort has not researched her column very well. If women voters want a candidate focused on family values, vote for George W. Bush. His campaign is based on family values.

Congratulations to Mark Simoneau. He won K-State's best male athlete award. He is a wonderful role model to everybody. Why isn't he mentioned in Christopher McLemore's draft column?

Yeah, I was wondering where I could buy a drug-tax stamp.

If Calc I is the hardest class on campus, KU has the best football team in the Big 12.

Now that Frank Murphy got drafted, he can afford to buy his own BMW.

I can't believe IFC would let Acacia alumni push them around.

the women's basketball practice, something Ramage said she noticed.

"He was just the guy who wanted to do everything," she said. "He did it on his own time just to get involved. That is just something that will never be forgotten by our team, ever."

Patterson said Golay always was ready to perform, no matter what was asked of him.

"If you dared him to be on the high dive, he wouldn't just jump, he'd pull a 2 1/2," she said. "He'd jump and give you something special."

His specialty of making people laugh was something Darrell Zarmanian, senior in hotel and restaurant management, said he liked the most.

"We're both comedians. It's really hard to make someone laugh when you're the one who makes people laugh," he said. "We were both characters."

Friends talked about how the main thing they learned from Golay was that one and never can have too many friends, that he really was good at accepting people.

This is why his death was so hard to take, Pesci said.

"His death was out of sync," he said. "It slaps us in the face and hits us in the gut."

Although members of Golay's family said they've been searching to fill a void in their hearts, they harbor no anger.

"We have yet to blame the Lord for what's happened," Ken Golay, Darin's father, said. "Maybe the Lord wanted somebody to run the hotel and restaurant upstairs."

Court orders Gonzalez to stay in U.S.

By MARK STEVENSON
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

MIAMI — Chastising the government for ignoring the wishes of a 6-year-old boy, a federal appeals panel on Wednesday ordered that Elian Gonzalez must remain in the United States until an asylum hearing next month.

The court action, extending an earlier stay granted by one of the judges, marked the latest in a series of victories for Elian's Miami relatives, who have been battling his Cuban father in an international tug-of-war over the child. The order, however, does not prevent the government from reuniting father and son in the United States.

In Little Havana, a tense vigil quickly became a celebration, with people dancing, crying and chanting, "God Bless America."

"The Gonzalez family continues to believe in the laws of the United States," said Lazaro Gonzalez, the great-uncle who so publicly defied Attorney General Janet Reno's demand to turn the boy over to his father last week. "We will continue to pray ... that (Elian) may remain where his mother wanted him to be, in the life of freedom."

Reno said she would abide by the court order.

"But it does not disagree with my determination. It does not say that the boy cannot be reunited with his father," she said. "I believe Elian should be reunited with his father and I said that all along."

Wednesday's order was by a three-judge panel of the 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Atlanta. The government could seek to have the stay lifted by the full circuit court or by a U.S. Supreme Court justice. Or it could wait until a scheduled May 11 hearing before the federal appeals court on the asylum request by the Miami relatives. The Immigration and Naturalization Service had denied that request.

see if it's feasible," he said.

Brownback said he would like to do the survey over KATS next year when students enroll.

Lenkner said each committee chair position had more than one candidate contesting for it.

"In that sense, it was spread out to the point that there was a decision to make with each one," he said.

Lenkner said he already has talked with the applicants who weren't selected as committee chairs to offer them ways to stay involved with student government. One opportunity for those applicants and other students on campus who want to get involved is the at-large positions available on each committee.

"Each committee has students who are not on Senate," Lenkner said.

Lenkner said applications for the at-large positions still are available in the OSAS on the ground floor of the K-State Student Union, and he encourages students to apply.

"people things" ought to take high priority, such as social services, he said.

Priorities need to be changed, he said, and this is reflected by Stamel's few ties with the business community.

"If I represent anybody, it should be the common man," he said. "I think the little guy needs representation, too."

Before concentrating on campaigning, though, Stamel said he wants to finish the school year first.

One of his biggest challenges will not be the physical or emotional fatigue he said he's expecting, but rather the way Kansas politics work.

"My biggest challenge is getting elected in a Republican city in a Republican county," he said. "If you want to get elected in Kansas, put an 'R' by your name. That's the reality."

Stamel said he'll depend on his reputation for looking at both sides of a situation, asking good questions and gathering enough information before making decisions.

Some hesitations have emerged, such as his personal life. He has two children, 9 and 13, who will not be able to see their father as often as they do now. But they're both excited he's running and give him full support, he said.

In addition, Stamel said he hopes he's not attacked by others' campaigns.

"But it's politics," he said. "You'll never know what's going to happen."

If Stamel is elected, he will represent the 66th district for three years.

"I hope people are willing to listen to what the candidates have to say," he said. "If I'm good at it and enjoy it, I might run again."

Members of the K-State women's crew team cheer their teammates at the Kansas Cup Regatta on Saturday morning. The team practices at 5:45 a.m.

Women's crew team devotes early mornings to daily workout, practice

By MICHAEL NOLL
KANSAS STATE COLLEGEIAN

The moon filters through wisps of clouds at 5:45 a.m. onto the seemingly deserted city of Manhattan. Nearly every K-State student still is fast asleep.

Every student, that is, save the 28 women making their way out to Tuttle Creek Reservoir. Slumber merely is a memory for the members of K-State women's rowing team, who are gathering for their daily practice.

The team filters into the boathouse, surprisingly cheerful considering the time. Such enthusiasm is not always the case, though, novice-team coach Kevin Harris said.

"It's tough," Harris said. "For about the first three weeks of the every season, I say I can't believe I'm doing this again."

Soon the team finishes stretching and prepares to take the water. This morning, however, a stiff wind has turned Tuttle Creek into a much more treacherous course than usual, and a decision is made to move practice to the indoor facility.

First, though, the team must reload the boats onto the trailer. As in all parts of rowing, the coxswains direct the team in the maneuvering.

"The coxswain is like an assistant coach," Harris said. "They have to know the race plan and be smart enough to change things. Basically, we need a Rhodes Scholar who weighs about 110 pounds."

Unlike the earlier counterparts, whose steady drum beat paced rowers on galleons, the coxswain is responsible for encouragement and coaching, Varsity Eight coxswain Maria Petersen said.

"Technically, if they're doing something wrong, we'll help them to fix it," Petersen said. "Because they can't see their blade, and we can because we face them and their blades are coming at us."

"Another thing is telling them where they're at," Petersen said. "They have no clue. In a race, they're not supposed to look out, just watch the body in front of them. So it's pretty much our job to tell them where they're at and where other boats are at."

Once the boats are loaded, the players and coaches head over to the Brandeberry Indoor Complex for a land workout on ergometers, or rowing machines.

The sight of the three rows of eight ergs elicits much less enthusiasm than did the prospect of racing through the lake.

"This is the worst thing about rowing," Varsity Eight port rower Missy Darnell said. "It makes a lot of people quit."

The reason behind the rowers' dislike of the ergs soon becomes apparent. After the first 1,000-meter run, some rowers already have begun to grit their teeth. The benefits, however, are tremendous, assistant coach Sandra Chu said.

"It just gets them in awesome shape for the boat," Chu said.

And being in shape is crucial for the team, which is about average size for collegiate crew. No K-Stater is taller than 6 feet, but Olympic rowers usually are at least that tall, Chu said.

"Most of the women on the Olympic team are over 6 feet and close to 200 pounds. They're big women," Chu said. "And the women who win the Olympics, the Romanians, are even bigger than that. They fill a door frame."

Nevertheless, several K-State rowers have considered or are considering trying out for the Olympic team. Sophomore Josie McClellan was one of 16 rowers invited last year to the U.S. Rowing Freshman Camp in Chula Vista, Calif. She since has decided not to pursue an Olympic gold, however, because most Olympic rowers do not peak until age 30.

"I decided that wasn't what I wanted out of rowing," McClellan said. "Maybe the reason is because I want to start a family, and I want to be able to have a body that isn't beat up by then."

Injuries are indeed an ever-present part of rowing, freshman Alyssa Adams said.

"Just because it's such a competitive motion, if you get a little ache and pain, and you row on it for a week without doing anything, it gets really inflamed," Adams said.

Injuries, as painful as they might be, rarely keep a rower out of the boat simply because there are no replacements available, Adams said.

"If you're hurting, you just have to push through it, because everyone is counting on you," Adams said.

After practice is over, the team quickly leaves. Some members will tend to injuries, and most will go to classes. All will be back for practice the next day — at 5:45 a.m.

"If you're HURTING, you just have to PUSH through it. Everyone is"

Wildcats continue to pound non-conference foes

K-State second baseman Josh Cavender throws to first to complete the game-ending double play ahead of William Woods' Brandon Talbot in the seventh inning Wednesday. MIKE SHEPHERD/ COLLEGEIAN

KSU extends winning streak to 7 games

By MIKE VIETTI
KANSAS STATE COLLEGEIAN

The final contest in K-State's five-game non-conference stretch ended in much the same fashion as the others with a 15-2 victory over William Woods.

The Wildcats (16-20 overall, 3-14 Big 12) re-enter Big 12 Conference play at Iowa State this weekend riding the momentum of a seven-game winning streak.

K-State early on gave the impression that for the first time in seven games: it wouldn't score in the double digits.

"Today, we struggled a little bit coming out of the gates," K-State head coach Mike Clark said. "We hadn't seen pitching like that and it caused us a little bit of trouble because the guy was so wild."

K-State did score twice in the second and fourth innings to lead 4-1, but the Cats didn't really get their bats swinging until the fifth inning.

Junior catcher Nick Scelfo led off with a double and moved to third on freshman outfielder Joey Ammirato's sacrifice bunt. Junior third and second baseman Josh Cavender then was hit by a pitch before junior outfielder Kasey Weishaar singled in Scelfo and advanced to second on the throw. Freshman Pat Maloney promptly stepped to the plate and cracked his third homer of the season to extend the Cats' lead to 8-1.

The Wildcats didn't stop there, with seven-run sixth inning, highlighted by senior second baseman Chad Tabor and junior first baseman Mark English.

Cavender also homered, although his was of the inside-the-park variety, in the fourth inning. The Wildcats hit four home runs in the game, their most all season.

Tabor went 2 for 3 with two runs, three RBI and two stolen bases, while Cavender knocked in three runs and scored three, and junior outfielder Chris Nelson added three hits, an RBI, a run and a stolen base.

K-State used six pitchers in the seventh inning, run-rule-shortened game. Freshman Spencer Black (1-0) threw the first three innings and gave up no runs to earn the victory.

Clark said he's pleased with the level of baseball the Cats are playing at, but also that the team might have been looking ahead to this weekend.

"We left a ton on, we had baserunners the whole game — it's just tough to play a game like this," Clark said. "I know the guys were looking forward to Iowa State, and that's a big series coming up, but you have to learn to play the game every day and come prepared to play the game every day."

K-State's 1st baseman provides power for Cats

By SAM STIERS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGEIAN

K-State first baseman Mark English was two for three with two singles as he stepped into the batter's box Wednesday during K-State's game against William Woods.

"It was a 1-0 count, and I knew he was going to throw a fastball, so I just tried to hit it as hard as I could," English said.

English hit the pitch hard enough to drive it out of Frank Myers Field, his seventh home run of the year.

English has been the Cats' power source all season but has stepped up his play during the Cats' recent seven-game winning streak.

Head coach Mike Clark said English is showing more patience at the plate, and it has translated into better play.

"He's doing an excellent job," Clark said. "I think the fact we've played a lot of games here in a row has helped. He's been able to get into a rhythm and adjust to breaking pitches and curveballs. Those were the pitches that were giving him trouble — now those are the pitches that he's hitting for home runs."

English has hit safely in a career-high 11 straight games. During K-State's seven-game winning streak, he is batting better than .600 and has 18 RBI. English said confidence has been a key for him during the stretch.

"I think I've been getting better pitches to hit, and I've been a lot more patient," English said. "Our team has started to hit better, and it's been contagious."

On the season, English is batting .370 and has a team-high 39 RBI. He also leads the team in slugging percentage and has three stolen bases on three attempts.

"Mark's got great hands, great hand-eye coordination and great wrists. That allows him to generate good bat speed, and if he does get the ball up in the air a little bit it has a chance to go out. What I like to see is the line drives and hard ground balls," Clark said. "It's the batting average and constancy that we need, and that's what he's given us."

Clark said he hopes English will be able to continue his great hitting against Iowa State this weekend, but he said only time will tell.

"He has to stay confident. We're going to see a little bit better pitching this weekend than we've seen the last four or five games," Clark said.

"But good hitters adjust to that, and hopefully he'll be able to continue to drive in runs for us."

Rocker's return painful to some

John Rocker is back.

As much as it infuriates New York Mets fans (and just about everybody else associated with Major League Baseball), the Atlanta pitcher rejoined the Braves' roster Tuesday in the team's 12-inning, 4-3 victory over Philadelphia at Turner Field.

Rocker made his 2000 debut in the top of the ninth inning with the score tied, 3-3. The southpaw struck out a batter and surrendered no runs in his one inning of work.

For those of you unaware of the Rocker controversy, please allow me to clue you in on the details.

Baseball commissioner Bud Selig originally banned the Braves' reliever until May 1, fining him $20,000 for comments offending foreigners, minorities and gays.

However, arbitrator Shyam Das reduced the suspension to the first two weeks of the 2000 season, cut the fine to a measly $500 and allowed Rocker to report to spring training March 2.

How he got that sweet of a deal is beyond me, considering some of the outrageous comments he made to the media.

Just to give you an idea of the unethical slurs I'm talking about, here's a quote from Rocker in the December 1999 issue of Sports Illustrated:

"Imagine having to take the 7 train to (New York's Shea Stadium) looking like you're (in) Beirut, next to some kid with purple hair, next to some queer with AIDS, right next to some dude who got out of jail for the fourth time, right next to some 20-year-old mom with four kids."

If that wasn't enough to tick off New Yorkers, check out what else Rocker told Sports Illustrated:

"The biggest thing I don't like about New York are the foreigners. I'm not a very big fan of foreigners. You can walk an entire block in Times Square and not hear anybody speaking English...How the hell did they get into this country?"

Well, I guess those kinds of outbursts pretty much speak for themselves. It's not hard to formulate an opinion, is it? Comments such as that are degrading to sports fans everywhere, not to mention a demerit and dishonor to the integrity and virtue of "America's pastime."

Now, it's no question that Rocker still has some faithful fans despite his rash actions last year. In fact, he drew mostly cheers when he pitched at Turner Field in the April 1 exhibition game, two days before Opening Day.

In his 2000 debut Tuesday, one proud fan even held a sign that read, "Rocker: We love ya and we need ya."

But those are Braves fans. By no means are Rocker's enemies few and far between.

Although no organized protests were scheduled to take place for his return Tuesday, a civil-rights official once again called on Atlanta to trade Rocker.

"It's still a blemish on the Braves organization... and, to a certain degree, a shame for the city," said Michael Bond, deputy director of the NAACP's Atlanta chapter.

Bond said if Rocker isn't traded by the July 11 All-Star Game in Atlanta, he'll definitely raise the issue again.

"As long as that type of attitude prevails in society, we have to combat it," Bond said. "He could say he's sorry, but once the cat is out the bag, you can't retract that kind of hateful statement."

However, it seems pretty apparent that Atlanta needs Rocker on the mound, looking at the team's struggles in his absence.

The Braves' bullpen allowed 15 earned runs in 28 innings during the first two weeks of the season, as Atlanta split its first 12 games of 2000.

In fact, shying away from his personal issues, it's hard to look past Rocker's numbers on the mound. He boasts a 0.61 ERA in 64 games pitched at Turner Field, holds the second-most saves in franchise history and struck out 104 batters in 72 and one-third innings a year ago.

Braves' Manager Bobby Cox said Monday that Atlanta still is confident in Rocker's ability, despite his off-field controversies.

"We won't avoid using him," Cox told ESPN. "He's a talented pitcher, and that's what this is really all about."

"We've talked about this so much, that now it's just time to go out and get it over with. We're not making a big deal about it. That's (the media's) thing."

However, the Mets and other organizations are making a big deal of it. I guarantee he'll receive harsh reactions in Philadelphia (May 12-14), Chicago (May 29-31) and definitely New York, where Atlanta meets the Mets in a four-game series beginning June 29.

Just in case you were wondering if New York fans still are upset about Rocker's infamous comments, photocopied fliers already are circulating in Shea Stadium advertising "John Rocker Battery Day" for the Braves' first series with the Mets.

Baseball should be quite concerned with providing security for Rocker outside Atlanta, because he's sure to get torn apart as soon as he sets foot on the East Coast.

However, in fairness to Rocker, he has put forth effort. He issued a statement expressing his remorse for his statements and also made an apology to his teammates in a clubhouse meeting.

He has refused to discuss the issue since that day and is trying to put the situation behind him.

I applaud him for that. Maybe he deserves a second chance.

In any event, I'm a firm believer that in any sport, fans are going to remember what they've seen long after what they've heard.

So maybe there is hope for Rocker after all.

GODFATHER OF THE KITCHEN

Benny Gomez, the chef at Beta Sigma Psi fraternity, discovered his desire to cook while stationed in Italy. A combat injury forced him into the kitchen, where he has prepared meals for other overseas troops, U.N. members, Colin Powell and President Clinton. This is Gomez's first year at the Beta Sigma Psi house.

People call him "The Dude," "The Godfather" and "Superman" around the Beta Sigma Psi house. But people from the United Nations and the military, as well as Carlos Santana, knew him as Benny Gomez.

Gomez grew up on the south side of Chicago, and in November 1969, at 17, he enlisted in the military and left for California.

"There was actually a lack of work in Chicago. Plus it helped the family, too," he said. "My dad was very proud. He had been in the Marine Corps. He was just happy I was doing something besides becoming a bum."

He was in the infantry and fought in the Vietnam War. A tug on his pants reveals gangrene scars from the war, caused after he jumped feet first into bamboo shoots.

After returning to California, he left for Germany on a change of duty.

"I was scared at first because I had never been anywhere outside of the U.S.," he said. "It was a good experience."

Gomez took advantage of free weekends to travel everywhere in Europe, except for Czechoslovakia and Russia. His favorite, however, was Austria.

He and five friends got a tour package where they could practice their skills on the Olympics course, which just had finished.

"You've never seen five drunk G.I.s in a toboggan," he said with a laugh.

However, it was Italy that determined his destiny.

"That's when I got my first taste where I knew I wanted to cook," Gomez said.

After his trip to Italy, he enrolled in a culinary arts institute in Germany and studied there for two and a half years.

He then got stationed at Fort Knox, Ky., but after a training accident, he was classified as a 94-Bravo.

In military terms, this meant Gomez was a cook, and after a certain Sgt. Rio saw his skills, he encouraged the soldier to go into an Army culinary competition.

Gomez won his first gold medal at Fort Lee, Va., and then went back to Germany, where he was in charge of a dining facility and found time to compete.

"You're going up against the best of the best," he said. "You're judged hard."

So hard, in fact, that one time Gomez made 1,500 icing roses and picked three perfect ones to decorate a cake.

He later interned at the Waldorf-Astoria in New York, where he worked under a picky executive chef. His boss would carry little plastic spoons in his pocket to make sure everything tasted right. But one day, Gomez' food did not please his boss' palate.

"I was making stuffed crab, and there's a membrane in the crab you have to remove before cooking," he said. "That was $750 that ended up in the trash can. It was an honest mistake."

Gomez was working at the Pentagon under Colin Powell before he retired.

He was in charge of 150 cooks, and the day President Clinton came to see soldiers returning from Somalia, Gomez put out a great buffet.

"All he had was a ham sandwich," he said. "I guess he didn't want to make a pig of himself."

But Gomez, having worked in Somalia, said he

Beta Sigma Psi chef Benny Gomez doesn't just cook food for the guys who live in the house — he also plays guitar with them.

knew the soldiers would finish off the buffet.

Somalia had been Gomez' biggest challenge ever.

"OK. Are you ready for this? I was in charge of feeding 13 nations of the United Nations," he said. "We're talking from Germans to Zimbabweans. We're talking about 13 different diets."

He was working seven days a week, from 4 a.m. to 7 p.m. every day.

Language also was a problem, because each nation had brought its own cooks, and Gomez supervised all 47 of them.

This was a step up from his prior responsibility of feeding 10,000 soldiers every day during the Persian Gulf War.

Every four months, Gomez would go into a Saudi Arabian city and buy food for his unit.

But this wasn't the hardest part.

"The hardest time I had was during the Persian Gulf and had just divorced my wife," he said. "You have all these soldiers getting letters from loved ones ... you're just sitting there and you don't get anything."

"I got three letters only. That's when it impacts you the most. You sometimes get the feeling that nobody's thinking about you."

However, Gomez married his current wife, Orrene, in 1997.

He met her while working at a nursing home in Abilene after retiring from the military.

"She's really one of the greatest sunshines in my life," he said. "She takes care of me. What more can a man ask for?"

Orrene said when she met Gomez, she thought he was a little bit better than everyone else and intelligent, too.

"We just really learned how to grow together a lot," she said. "He's learned how to enjoy the country life."

Gomez said he decided to retire in Kansas because it's slow-paced.

He was born in Wichita and has served at Fort Riley. Plus, his daughter lives in Chapman, Kan.

"I relaxed for a year and a half in Kansas, and then I got bored," he said. "Military puts age on you. To me, I felt I had done all I could have for the military. What more was there for me to experience?"

Boredom led Gomez to apply for a position as a cook at the Beta Sig house, where he started working in August.

"It's been great ever since. They don't expect a lot, but I give them a hell of a lot," he said. "I wouldn't give this up for anything in the world."

Mike Stohs, junior in construction science and management, said he met Gomez last year. He said he admires his friendliness and willingness to work.

"The most I've gotten out of Benny are the crazy stories he's told me," Stohs said. "He reminds me of a 21-year-old in a 47-year-old's body."

Despite meeting him eight months ago, fraternity members learn something new from Gomez every day, like how he graduated from Central Texas College in Europe and majored in English literature, and how he almost became a schoolteacher when he retired, or how, when he was 16, he played guitar on stage with Santana.

It was 1968, and Gomez had just joined the band "Killer Frog."

They beat out 150 other bands to be the warm-up band for the Carlos Santana concert.

"One of the road managers told me, 'You're going to play out there with Santana,'" he said. "As he started to play 'Black Magic Woman,' I walked out on stage. The spotlight is on you, and he looks at you and tells you to take over."

"When it was over, I was exhilarated, man. For that split moment, you are somebody."

Gomez had turned down a $75,000 cooking job with his cousin in New York to work at the fraternity house, but he said he has no regrets.

Recently, he created a barbecue sauce, named it "The Beta Sigma Psi Slicker Sauce," and sent it off for a Jack Daniel's sauce cook-off.

He also parties with the fraternity, something his wife said she has to get used to.

"It was a little bit hard to take at first," Orrene said. "But he really enjoys himself. I think that's very important for him, to have a little space for himself."

Gomez is happy with how things are going, too.

"I've had a great life. I wouldn't change it for anything in the world," he said. "I'm not ready to die. I can party with the best of them."

Brownback works for farm bill

By JENN DAVOREN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A barn used to house large-scale farming equipment served as an auditorium for Sen. Sam Brownback, R-Kan., on Thursday as he addressed an audience of local agriculturalists at the K-State Agronomy Research Farm.

Brownback paid a visit to Manhattan to publicize a bill that would promote carbon sequestration, or the removal of carbon dioxide from the air and storage in soil, through monetary rewards for producers who use this practice.

The sequestration of carbon has become an important issue to environmentalists due to the possible involvement of the gas in the process of global warming, Brownback said.

"This bill is based on what a lot of people in this room and at K-State have done," Brownback said. "K-State has been doing innovative research into the benefits of carbon sequestration in regards to global warming concerns."

Following his segment of the conference, Brownback introduced Chuck Rice, professor of agronomy and soil microbiologist, to explain how carbon is introduced to the atmosphere and how its sequestration is possible.

"With the plowing of soil and cultivation, we've lost about 50 percent of the carbon stored in the soil," he said. "Plowing breaks up the particles carbon is protected in and releases it into the atmosphere."

"If we could protect carbon in the soil, we could keep and increase the amount of carbon."

Brownback said Kansas farmers would see a vast improvement in their lands due to sequestration practices.

"It will provide better incentives to increase the storage of carbon dioxide in soils," he said. "As a result, these practices will also lead to better water quality, less runoff pollution, better wildlife habitat and an additional revenue source for farmers."

Producers should see financial benefits as well under this new piece of legislation, which Brownback said he will introduce to the Senate next week. Land-owning farmers could receive conservation payments for carbon-storage practices such as buffer strips, biomass production, no-till and minimum till, which require little or no disturbance of soil.

Brett Myers, executive vice president of the Kansas Association of Wheat Growers, said that while the idea of carbon sequestration was a good one, the practice is widely unknown among agricultural producers.

"We're going to have to let producers know what it is, how it works, and what it will do for them," Myers said.

One concern with this agricultural technique, Myers said, was that government officials would have too much control in what local farmers did with their land. However, with the spread of carbon sequestration throughout the agricultural industry, a shift in control is possible.

"It brings up the question, 'How much do we want the government involved in these practices?'" he said. "If it gets up and running, the government's not going to be making these payments. The industry could be paying producers."

Brownback said carbon sequestration would give producers the opportunity not only to receive money from the government but also to benefit the agricultural industry as a whole.

"We're on the verge of seeing agriculture coming into a whole new market," he said. "Producers can now benefit rather than be burdened by environmental concerns."

LAPD to recruit officers

■ Police officials to visit KSU to promote job opportunities.

By GINA KOHAKE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Los Angeles Police Department is looking for young men and women interested in law enforcement.

Officers from the LAPD will be in the K-State Student Union on Monday from 9 a.m. to 4 p.m. to inform K-State students of the career possibility in Southern California.

"Los Angeles is a diverse city with approximately 4 million inhabitants. With so many cultures, it is a broadening life experience," Frank Banuelos, LAPD police officer, said. "As a police officer, you have a challenging and rewarding career with numerous opportunities for upward mobility."

Anyone interested who falls between the ages of 20 1/2 and 34 with no felony convictions and is a U.S. citizen is encouraged to attend the testing session, Banuelos said.

"Our section is unique because the LAPD recruits persons to take the entry-level exam. If they pass it, it is good until they are 35," Banuelos said. "We plant the seed, but we also encourage people to finish college first. We just want them to evaluate their career paths early."

The test, which begins at 5 p.m. in Union 213, is the first of the seven-step hiring process. Banuelos said it consists of 50 multiple choice questions and an essay section.

"It is just one test. If you pass, you will receive a letter. Then, at your leisure, you can come to L.A. and in a one-week period finish the process," Banuelos said. "If you get hired, the starting salary for a person with a bachelor's degree is $44,500 and an additional relocation fee of $2,000."

The force also offers the possibility of tuition reimbursements.

When Wednesday nights are not filled with homework, Dan Maximuk, junior in pre-professional construction science and management, and Erin Devries, sophomore in mass communications, play bingo at the American Legion. Maximuk said playing bingo is a good way to relieve stress, even though it can be a stressful activity.

RAKING IT IN AT BINGO

STORY BY ANGELA KISTNER ■ PHOTOS BY REED DUNN

Game gives students entertainment alternative while winning cash, socializing

Intensity fills the room. Everyone's waiting, hoping — just one more number. The next number is called.

Groans replace the intensity as Sara Platt, Manhattan resident, calls out "Bingo" for the third game in a row, adding another $20 to her cash prizes for a total of $50.

Platt's been going to Bingo at the American Legion for about six months. She said she hardly ever wins.

"I think this is the second time I've won," she said.

Some Bingo players thought the game was rigged after Platt won her third game.

"If that's your daughter, there's going to be an investigation," someone yelled out jokingly to the Bingo caller.

But she wasn't his daughter. Platt said she was just there to get out of the house and to sit and chat with people.

Dan Maximuk and Erin Devries, students at K-State, play bingo for another reason.

"We come when we don't have homework to do," Devries, sophomore in mass communications, said.

The chance to win money also lures Maximuk, junior in construction science and management, and Devries to bingo.

"Last week one of my friends won $100, and I won $30," Maximuk said.

Devries said that was her inspiration for going to play bingo with Maximuk, and she won the first time she came.

"I almost knocked the table over," she said. "It was embarrassing."

Maximuk said other friends used to come with him, but the excitement wore off for them and now Devries is his only bingo partner.

"She was the only one down with it," he said.

There are several places around Manhattan to play bingo — the American Legion, VFW and Eagles. Maximuk and Devries commented that if people wanted to, they could find a place to play bingo every night.

"If you win, it covers two times of playing," he said.

At the American Legion, where Maximuk and Devries play, bingo players can win up to $20 for regular games, which is five in a row or four corners. The real jackpots can be won, though, for the special games, which include blackout, diamond and double bingo. These jackpots include $50, $150 and even $300 cash prizes.

Sharon Hathaway, a Manhattan resident, said a friend of hers won $300 on April 4. She even had the receipt to prove it.

However, Hathaway said she usually does not win.

"The college crowd usually wins," she said.

Phil Gerdes, American Legion bingo caller and Computer and Network Services technician, said the amount of money paid out to players depends on the amount of money the Legion brings in that night.

The maximum possible payout is $1,200 in one night, he said.

Gerdes wouldn't say how much money the Legion brings in from bingo in one night.

Maximuk marks numbers on his paper bingo card. The American Legion has bingo Wednesday nights from 7:30 to 9:30.

"We can lose money, and we can make money," he said.

Gerdes has been calling numbers at the Legion for nine years, and he said that's his favorite part.

"That's what's fun," he said. "I used to play, but never won."

Maximuk said playing bingo is a fun time, but if students are looking for relaxing entertainment, bingo isn't for them. He said he and Devries came during finals week last semester to relieve stress, but it was just as stressful.

"It's real intense," he said.

Citizens begin clean-up after Parsons storm

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

PARSONS, Kan. — Residents and downtown merchants spent Thursday assessing tornado damage that turned numerous homes and businesses into rubble.

For new mayor Tommey McLarty, it was a rough start to his post.

"I've had better days," McLarty said. "But we're lucky. The warnings were adequate."

The storm blew into town shortly before 9 p.m. Wednesday, damaging homes, businesses, the Parsons police and fire buildings and the new Parsons Theatre, which opened just last month.

Parsons' fire chief Tim Hay said the twister entered the southwest side of town, staying above ground for much of its path but flattening buildings and sucking roofs off others as it moved through the downtown Parsons Plaza district.

The twister, one of four to hit southeast Kansas, sent 27 people to the hospital for treatment of mostly slight injuries. A spokeswoman at the Labette County Medical Center said one woman required surgery for a broken leg.

Gov. Bill Graves declared a state of emergency for Labette, Neosho, Montgomery and Crawford counties Thursday, according to his spokesman Don Brown. Tornadoes also caused damage in Walnut, Erie and Cherryvale.

In Parsons, hundreds of cars sustained damage, including most of the vehicles at two auto dealerships. Just north of the plaza, the Eagles lodge lost its second floor as a group met below.

"One man was injured when he was hit by a beam or other debris that fell into the first floor," said Dwayne Kelsey, who viewed the damage. "I tried to get everybody into a smaller room, but they didn't all go."

Also caught in the path was a carnival operated in the plaza by Toby's Amusements of Arma, Kan. People were coming off the

1 killed by blast at Holcomb IBP meat-processing plant

One person died Thursday in an explosion at the IBP meat-processing plant in Holcomb, Kan.

Finney County Sheriff Kevin Bascue said his officers responded to an explosion in the rendering area of the plant around 3 p.m.

Authorities do not yet know if anyone else was killed or injured. Bascue said he did not know what caused the explosion. The company had no comment.

IBP is the largest employer in the Garden City area with 2,750 employees. IBP opened the Finney County plant, just west of Garden City, in 1980, according to the Garden City Chamber of Commerce.

Officials to deport alleged Nazi guard back to Poland

DETROIT — The Justice Department has moved to deport a Polish immigrant for allegedly concealing his role as a guard in Nazi labor camps.

The government filed a complaint Wednesday against 80-year-old Iwan Mandycz, who told U.S. officials he had worked on his parents' farm in Poland and was a forced laborer during World War II.

Mandycz was an armed guard in 1943 at SS labor camps Trawniki and Poniatowa in Poland, where prisoners were given starvation rations, and brutal beatings were a daily occurrence, said Eli M. Rosenbaum, director of the Justice Department's Nazi-hunting Office of Special Investigations.

"Once the Nazis decided that the prisoners were no longer useful, they ... forced the prisoners at the two camps to dig their own graves and then murdered them en masse by gunfire," Rosenbaum said.

Mandycz, who lives in Sterling Heights, obtained a U.S. immigration visa in 1949 and became a naturalized citizen in 1955.

He has denied being a Nazi camp guard, and said he will fight deportation.

Ferdinand Hammer, another alleged Nazi who had lived in Sterling Heights, was deported in March. The U.S. Supreme Court refused to block the deportation.

Since 1978, the government has stripped 63 alleged Nazis of their U.S. citizenship, and 52 of those have left the country, the Justice Department said. About 250 others are under investigation.

Leaders discuss upcoming peace treaty's last deadline

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Secretary of State Madeleine Albright met Thursday with Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat as the State Department expressed confidence that Israel and the Palestinians are committed to meeting a September deadline for a final agreement.

Spokesman James P. Rubin also reaffirmed that the United States is prepared to play a more active role in recognition not only of the September deadline but also of others that are approaching.

"Everyone is agreed that we will play a more involved role by being at the table, trying to be creative, trying to help each side figure out what its needs are," Rubin said.

Arafat met with Albright over lunch at her residence. He planned a meeting later in the day with President Clinton.

At the White House, spokesman Joe Lockhart said the Palestinians and Israelis face very difficult issues.

"They have a very tight time line," he said. "I think the president thought it would be useful and effective to use this time to meet directly to see what we can do to keep these (talks) on track."

When Clinton met with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak last week, the discussion focused on the need for an accelerated pace, and that appeared to be at the center of Arafat's talks here as well.

The talks on a treaty framework are to begin after the Jewish Passover holiday, which ends April 26. Negotiators will meet in Israel and the Palestinian areas, rather than in Washington, as they have done in two previous rounds.

The Palestinians have said no progress has been made since talks on a blueprint for a peace treaty began in November.

Rubin said he was not aware that there are any new U.S. ideas that were being presented Thursday or any time soon.

Textbook selling. Students have a powerful new tool available when selling back textbooks.

Best Book Buys, an online comparison shopping site, now offers a feature that allows users to search for the best prices to sell books back.

The buy-back feature requires only the ISBN number for the books being sold back. By entering this into a search engine, the site returns a list of different web-based companies that will buy the book. The result lists each bookstore's name, the payment type, conditions, shipping conditions and the buy-back price.

Best Book Buys search engine searches 29 online bookstores.

"With this new buy-back service, we can provide students with an easy way to find which stores will buy back their books and for what price," Steve Loyala, president of Best Book Buys, said. "We can also offer them an easy way to compare the buyback options across the leading online college textbook stores, whether or not they bought their books online."

Hospital lawsuit. A jury awarded a 10-year-old New York boy $10 million for brain damage he suffered after hospital staffers turned his mother away three times when she was about to give birth to him.

The state jury awarded the money Wednesday to Brevenick "Pedro" Lara, who has cerebral palsy and is in a wheelchair. He cannot feed, bathe or dress himself and needs round-the-clock care, lawyer Judith Livingston said.

Livingston said that in 1990, staffers at Metropolitan Hospital turned away Maria Lara, telling her she was not ready to give birth even though she told them she knew she was in labor and about to have her fourth child.

On her fourth request for admission within about three hours, staffers agreed to examine her, Livingston said. She said that as they were helping her onto an examining table, the baby came.

During the delivery, Livingston said, the baby somehow suffered a head injury that caused bleeding in the brain.

The hospital's lawyer, Brendan Lantier, denied there was malpractice. He said the delivery was without incident, and the child's injuries are not related to procedures at his birth.

Environmental Fair promotes Earth Day events

By SARAH SOURK
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Golf course, restaurant and hotel managers might be key players in the fight for future environmental protection.

The environmental issues in food service and hospitality management classes are sponsoring an Environmental Fair today, in celebration of the 30th anniversary of Earth Day.

"The whole event is designed to promote Earth Day 2000 activities," said Carol Shanklin, professor of hotel, restaurant, institution management and dietetics.

Shanklin, who teaches the environmental issues class, said the fair will focus on issues faced by food services and how to conserve better.

"We hope that it increases knowledge to make decisions that will help with conservation methods," Shanklin said.

The Environmental Fair starts at 8:30 a.m. in the Hoffman Lounge of Justin Hall and runs until 1:30 p.m. The information will be presented in the form of posters.

Teams of 10 different groups will address certain environmental topics. The teams will distribute brochures and answer any questions that people might have.

The posters fall into 10 categories and will focus on recycling, composition, energy conservation, food recovery programs, ecotourism, smoking bans in restaurants and the health risks of second-

The Environmental Fair's main focus is informational. All of those in attendance will be able to register for door prizes and participate in an environmental quiz.

Shanklin said the poster topics are all relevant to the K-State campus and to the city of Manhattan.

"It will help others make environmentally friendly decisions in the future," Shanklin said.

Class members not only gathered the information for the posters, they also have been active in the planning and marketing of the event.

Christina Albino, junior in hotel and restaurant management, is enrolled in the environmental issues class. She is a member of the marketing team.

"It is a class we have all learned from — it links our major to the environmental concerns that surround hotel, restaurant and golf course management," Albino said. "Each group took their own path in developing their project, they had their own focus and viewpoint."

Albino said this is the first time for the environmental issues class to have Earth Day activities. She said she hopes the fair will occur again next year. Albino said that in the future it would be nice to see other departments become involved, along with environmentally concerned groups on campus.

"Students will take away something that they will use in their lives," she said.

Teachers in demand as shortage continues

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — College graduates trained as teachers are finding they are in demand as a national teacher shortage spills into Missouri and Kansas.

At job fairs this month in the two states, top teacher candidates are being hounded by recruiters offering incentives to sign contracts.

Robert Dumlal, one of only three graduates in Missouri this year certified to teach industrial technology, is evaluating offers from 11 districts, including one in Texas that has offered to repay his school loan.

"The candidates we are seeing are pretty cocky, and with the situation the way it is, they can afford to be," said David Leone, director of personnel for the Center School District in south Kansas City.

A nationwide teacher shortage has turned recruiters into hunters and top candidates into trophies.

Over the next 10 years, the nation will look for about 2.5 million teachers. Currently, 68,000 teachers work in Missouri. Districts need to hire about 10,000 this year, state officials said.

Kansas has about 37,000 teachers and will hire 1,200 more.

"There is no way we will be able to meet the demand. No way," said Kent McAnally, assistant director of career and employment services at the University of Kansas.

Job fairs this month at Kansas, the University of Missouri-Columbia and other colleges are attracting recruiters from Texas, Connecticut and California.

"I feel like I can go anywhere I want and get a job on the spot," said Dumlal, who is from Lee's Summit, Mo. "It's kind of nice knowing everyone wants you."

At Missouri's job fair, administrators noticed that far fewer candidates showed up than last year, when more than 400 looked for jobs.

"We had only 265 job candidates, and I think it is because a lot of our candidates got job offers so early," said Linda Kaiser, MU's director of career and program support. "We had 165 school districts (this year), and each came with at least two recruiters."

SGA adopts resolution for restricting Internet abuse

By TANNER EHMKE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Student Senate adopted a resolution Thursday in support for restricting the abuse of K-State Internet resources.

The resolution was a result of the activities of just a handful of students using the Internet provided by the university for non-academic use, senators said.

Vice provost Elizabeth Unger previously spoke with Senate weeks prior to Thursday night's meeting asking for support from Senate to enforce the university's current policy on Internet abuse.

"It's not intentional abuse," Student Body President Jake Worcester said. "They don't realize they're causing that problem."

The university has been able to trace the large-scale abuse back to the general area of where a student might be using the Internet excessively, such as residence halls or student computer laboratories. About 20 to 30 students are responsible for using large portions of the university's available bandwidth.

Although the university cannot enforce regulation on every student for non-academic use, students have been cooperative if they have been asked to refrain from Internet abuse, Worcester said.

Since non-academic use of the Internet access provided by the university is restricted, the abuse could result in a possible violation of the Student Conduct Code, Worcester said. Action would be taken by the judicial branch. The policy is not being enforced now.

"They're causing problems for students using the Internet for academic purposes," Worcester said. "It's good for campus that students take a stand and protect the rights of all students to use our Internet resources."

Senate on Thursday night also approved the appointments of the SGA Executive Committee.

Department needs to finalize choice to gain support

It is time for the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics to make a decision.

Nearly an entire year after beginning inquiries into bringing an additional women's sport to K-State, the athletic department continues to kick ideas back and forth without committing to one. It is time to commit.

The idea behind adding a sport is that K-State needs to comply with Title IX, a piece of legislation introduced in the 1970s to ensure equity on the athletic fields.

To meet this requirement, K-State added a women's crew team a few years ago. While this moved the university closer to compliance, the addition of another sport remained necessary.

Associate athletic director Cindy Fox said the athletic department has narrowed its list of potential sports to soccer, softball, women's swimming and diving, equestrian and bowling.

While this certainly is progress toward a decision, it is not a final decision.

At a time when the athletic department has taken some controversial actions, a prompt decision would bring some degree of redemption.

The firing of Tom Asbury has been criticized for the way it was handled, and some of these criticisms certainly have merit.

The construction of a new baseball stadium continues to drag along as funds are sought from every possible source to compensate for poor planning on the part of the athletic department.

Now, a chance to redeem itself has emerged for the athletic department. A quick decision to add a women's sport could win back support from members of the K-State community who have begun to question the athletic department and Director Max Urlick.

There is no way to undo these past decisions.

But there is a chance to make sound ones for the future.

OUR VIEW, an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board, is written after a majority opinion is formed. OUR VIEW is the Collegian's official opinion.

Suburbia's side effects

Urban development responsible for destruction of Earth's irreplaceable natural resources

Mother Nature has been sending out distress signals for more than four decades.

At first, they seemed insignificant, such as the thin shells of bald-eagle eggs that cracked because they were contaminated with DDT. Then the signs became more apparent, as clouds of black smoke began to loom high above the Amazonian rain forests. Finally, as we sit on the dawn of a new millennium, the effects of deforestation and population overcrowding finally are beginning to show exactly how lethal they actually are.

Sadly, these signals pale in comparison with the countless number of species that have been forced to go the way of the dodo.

Not since an asteroid collided with Earth more than 65 million years ago have animal and plant species died out so fast. In fact, a recent U.N. report estimates that 20 percent of all freshwater species have vanished or been driven toward extinction in the past few decades.

How have we responded to this ever-intensifying crisis? We've established Earth Day, formed Green parties, passed countless environmental laws, written a few international treaties and organized several social events — including the 1992 Earth Summit in Rio de Janeiro, Brazil.

Locally, members of Students For Environmental Action completed a trash audit of Durland Hall and arrived at a conclusion that already should be common knowledge to everyone — we need to recycle, reduce and reuse more than we already do.

Despite the noble intent behind this catchy little jingle, the planet seems to be getting smaller, and the wide-open spaces the Dixie Chicks sing about are becoming few and far between.

Coincidentally, the "Recycle, Reduce, Reuse" initiative actually does little to deter what many consider to be the No. 1 environmental problem facing our society today — urban sprawl. Due to economic conditions, not to mention the frequently high crime rates within the inner cities, people are flocking to the safety and solace of the sprawling suburbs.

Growth patterns away from the inner city are at the root of many unsolved serious problems — air pollution, traffic congestion, urban run-off and inadequate sewage-treatment systems, urban blight, and loss of open space and agricultural land, to name only a few.

Urban sprawl also threatens the habitat of most animal and plant species — except for cockroaches, rats, pigeons, crabgrass and other organisms that thrive with mankind.

Relentless urban expansion is the main reason the world is quickly losing its biodiversity, increasing the likelihood that we eventually will live on a planet covered entirely by concrete.

In addition, sprawl costs taxpayers thousands of dollars to support the construction of new infrastructure, the continued loss of invaluable natural resources and lost opportunities to invest in our existing communities and neighborhoods.

Unfortunately, no one has a quick and easy way to eliminate sprawl. However, the smart-growth model has shown it at least can contain it.

The smart-growth model allows a particular city to grow more slowly while revitalizing its core.

This model produces more beautiful urban and suburban surroundings and shorter commutes on highways, while preserving precious farmland and picturesque country sides.

In addition, growth boundaries can be established to concentrate growth in certain places while avoiding others.

The plan can keep sprawl in check, but competition for limited space can make the city an expensive place to live — just as it has done in Portland, Ore.

Likewise, if a city has good rail and bus lines, development can be concentrated around mass-transit stops rather than spreading all over the countryside.

As we know, public transportation still is a tough sell here in the United States, but in most of the world, rail lines have kept sprawl from being worse than it is already.

Perhaps the easiest way to protect land is to buy it or declare it a national park, as President Clinton did to 34 of the country's remaining 75 Giant Sequoia groves, and permanently take it off the market. As one can imagine, this is a rather expensive option.

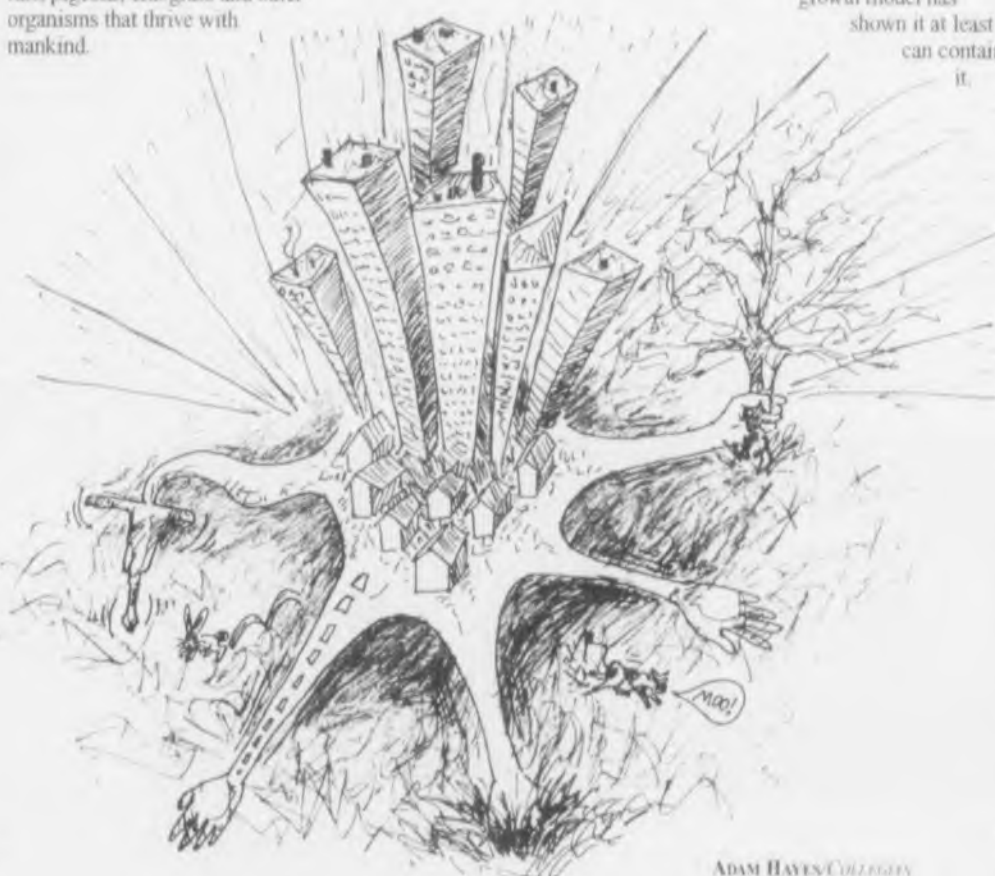

I realize we cannot all afford to do many of the ecological projects that need to be done.

Those projects should be left to those who can — such as Shania Twain, Leonardo DiCaprio, Chow Yun-Fat, Sting, Arundhati Roy and the Prince of Wales. But we can do our part by voting against legislation that would encourage sprawl, promoting initiatives that would protect rural areas and rebuild the inner cities, and educating others on the importance of conservation while continuing to "Recycle, Reduce, Reuse."

Lastly, we must acknowledge that human beings are not more valuable than the plants and animals, and that the Earth does not exist solely for us.

School employee deserves more than slap on wrist for child-molestation charges

What you are about to read could make you sick to your stomach.

If you don't have kids, imagine that for 14 years you had raised a son. You were there when he took his first step and helped send him off to elementary school.

If you are a woman, this is the son who grew under your heart for nine months before making his appearance in the world. Since that time, he has changed your heart in ways that only parents can comprehend fully.

But something terrible happens to your 14-year-old son. He is sexually assaulted by someone he trusted. He is molested by a 41-year-old school employee.

That sickening incident is what actually happened to a young boy. He was a child at Rockwood School who was molested by the schools' district clerk, Betty Bill, the St. Louis Post Dispatch reported April 8.

The mother of the son who was assaulted does not want to get everything she can out of the woman who did this to her son.

Instead, she wrote a letter to the St. Louis County Circuit judge, stating that the molestation charges should not be severe. She insisted that Bill needs to spend time with her daughters.

In the letter, the victim's mother wrote: "Your honor, we feel this could help her family to heal and to overcome this ordeal.

It will also allow our family to heal with a clear sense of mind and heart. Mrs. Bill is the mother of three daughters. Her crime was that of a sex offender, but we do not want her daughters to suffer for their mother's crime."

The judge then sentenced Bill to 90 days in jail and five years' probation. Another part of her sentence was to undergo psychiatric counseling.

It is shocking that, as a parent, the victim's mother would be so lenient after what happened to her son.

Her leniency came after he missed the entire first semester of school, suffered from a severe form of depression and required hospitalization. This does not even touch the treatment he received from his taunting classmates.

Bill took the victim's youth and innocence. And what does she get? A slap on the wrist. A punishment of which the victim's mother approves. A sentence that the victim's mother wanted.

It is honorable that the boy's mother sees how this could affect Bill's family life. It is not honorable that she has recommended that Bill's sentence be reduced.

More needs to be done than a three-month sentence, five years on probation and counseling.

Bill will be free to harm her children and others in the neighborhood and community.

This does not mean Bill cannot change her ways. Maybe she has learned her lesson and will get the help she needs.

Yet the fact remains that the safety of those around her must be questioned.

The 41-year-old might serve her mandatory sentence. She might even never be able to look in the mirror the same again.

But what about the 14-year-old? The damage is done.

More than likely, he will spend the rest of his life with emotional damage that nothing can help.

And the woman who did this to him will only have to spend one-fourth of a year behind bars.

READERS write

Editorial board opinion tarnishes Lafene's image

Editor,

I am writing in regards to the editorial, "Student Government Fails Students with Fee Increase," written by the Collegian Editorial Board in the March 28 Collegian.

In this editorial, the board wrote, "Because Lafene officials have displayed an extraordinary inability to manage funds competently, Senate was saddled with the responsibility of finding more money for the health center."

This was an inaccurate, leading statement, that damaged the name and reputation of Lafene's administration and, therefore, the health center itself. Our committee is responsible for promoting student health and, therefore, the student health center. Therefore, we felt great concern when the image of the health center might have been tarnished by the fallacy in this statement.

If our committee believed at any time that the administration of Lafene were incompetent, we would be the first to promote change. However, I can say that, after working with the Lafene staff for the past two years, they not only are quite competent, but also care a great deal about what students want.

First, Director Lannie Zweimiller has been successful at keeping expenditure increases under the trend set by the rest of the market, which was confirmed by the Privilege Fee Committee.

Second, it might appear that the financial management is inconsistent, because the privilege fee process has been an unusual source of revenue for a health center.

This is because it has been the strong belief of the administration — as well as the general student populace — that an office-visit charge should not be implemented at Lafene.

With this in mind, Zweimiller has attempted to find alternative sources of revenue, keep expenditures and privilege-fee increases low and prevent an office-visit charge. He successfully has carried out all of these goals despite the 1994 decrease in privilege-fee allocation.

With unavoidable increases in health-care expenses being greater than revenue generated, Lafene continued financial viability. However, it was predicted that, without an office-visit charge or a privilege-fee increase, Lafene would have closed in the year 2001. Zweimiller presented these facts to our committee as well as Student Senate, with the understanding that if an increase of revenue did not come from privilege fees, it would come from an office visit charge.

There was no immediate danger of sudden inadequate funding and Lafene's required revenue increase was no greater than previous years. Therefore, not only are these words slanderous, they also are highly inaccurate. I would be more than happy to discuss this issue with the editorial board and, in the future, I would recommend additional research and printed support for statements that are harmful to professional careers.

It is my belief that it was the board's intention to create a sensational editorial negating many different groups, including Lafene administration. Not only were they disseminating erroneous information, they also were potentially damaging the health center's image and the careers of Lafene's administration.

I also would like to point out the editorial board's glowing editorial about Lafene and support for free office visits earlier in the semester as an inconsistency, indicating a possible oversight in the wording of this statement.

Not only were these words highly inaccurate and unsupported, they also were hurtful to the staff of Lafene. Therefore, I believe a retraction is in order.

Speaker discusses themes of African summit

By DANICA COTO
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Stephan Tubene is trying to put the dying fish back into the sea.

He compares his work to the story of the little boy and the old man who were living in a village by the sea. The ocean's tide had dropped, and there were millions of dying fish lying in the sand.

The boy did not understand why the old man was so intent on saving the fish, since only a few could be saved.

But it's these few that make the difference, Tubene said.

In Tubene's world, the fish represent people he tries to educate about Africa.

"My concern is that the American public is not connected to Africa. Every news that they see is the stereotype of the media," Tubene said.

"When there's something bad going on in Africa, they can see it in the U.S., but when there's something good, one doesn't see it."

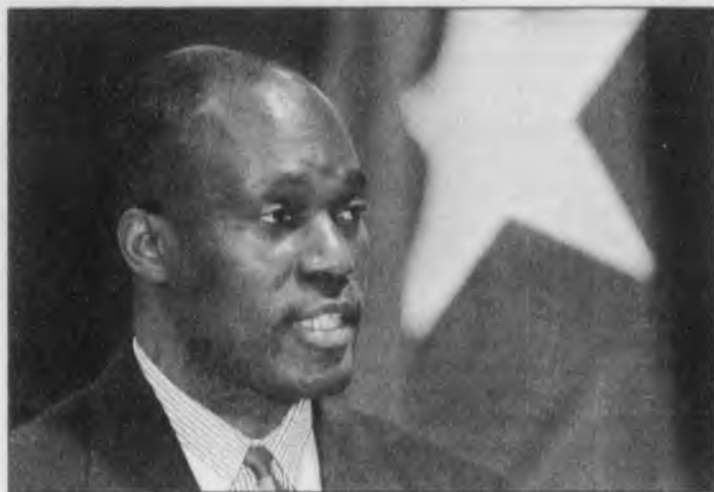

Tubene, who is from Congo, formerly known as Zaire, spoke on Thursday morning in the Union Big 12 Room about the implications of a national African summit in the United States.

He took an interest in solving African problems and then became part of the summit, a four-year, non-profit initiative that will address U.S. foreign policy toward Africa and changes the country needs to undergo.

The summit will address five themes, he said, the first being economic development and job creation.

They plan to lobby with the United States, as well as the World Bank and International Monetary Fund, to cooperate with debt relief, Tubene said.

"Congo was praised by World

MIKE SHEPHERD/COLLEGIAN

Stephan Tubene, a professor from the University of Maryland and K-State Ph.D. recipient, speaks Thursday morning about American's disconnection from Africa. "My concern is that the American public is not connected to Africa," he said. "When there's something bad going on in Africa, they can see it in the U.S., but when there's something good, one doesn't see it."

Bank and IMF as the best student," he said.

The second addresses economic development and quality of life, such as providing Africa with clean water and disease control.

They also plan to ask Congress to have a clear policy on peace and security, seeing that there is none, he said.

The fourth theme concerns democracy and human rights, and the last one is about education and culture.

This is something about which Tubene said he is adamant.

The United States needs to do some research and have cultural conventions, he said.

"Here in America, people don't have good information on Africa. The visibility of Africa should be promoted in the U.S. and throughout the world," he said. "By visibility, I see people being informed not only about the bad part, but the good part of Africa."

Tubene, who teaches at the University of Maryland, got his doctoral degree at K-State, and while he was here, he founded the Congolese Student and Scholars Association.

This came as a result of the United States supporting Zaire's president Mobutu, who was a dictator for 30 years.

However, that was during the Cold War, and Tubene said he now sees a bright future for Africa — if the United States can help.

"What we need is our friend to help us build on that momentum," he said.

"Of course, we have problems in Africa, but that shouldn't be the focus,"

Kisangani Emizet, assistant professor of political science and CSSA adviser, said he brought Tubene to speak because he's so involved in the summit.

"It's quite frankly,

today, on the agenda," Emizet said. "He's been involved quite some time in those issues."

There were other reasons, too.

"He was also one of the most dynamic students on campus,"

Emizet said.

One of Tubene's concerns is American policy toward Africa, which became independent in the 1960s, and the news media's portrayal of the country.

"We have learning to do," he said.

"It's not overnight that this will happen."

Tubene is referring to changes in American policies that will increase investment in Africa and create a partnership with the United States.

One time, a woman asked him

why the United States got involved when there was trouble in the world, but stepped back when Africa had problems.

"I was deeply touched in a negative way," Tubene said.

Another change Tubene said needs to occur is what the news media report when they cover Africa.

He said the news media failed to cover the positive news of elections going on in different African countries.

"They want to show that everything in Africa is bad," he said. "That should not handicap Africa in their move towards development."

Although Africa recently has experienced great social, political and economical change, Tubene said he is not yet satisfied.

"I will not have piece of mind if I know I'm better off here," he said.

"I'll never have piece of mind when I see people starving in Africa. I have to do my part."

Students and Manhattan residents will have an opportunity to explore the Muslim culture Saturday.

The K-State Muslim Student Association is sponsoring the sixth annual Open House of the Islamic Center of Manhattan. The open house will take place at 1224 Hilton Heights from 10 a.m. to 4 p.m.

"The most important aspect of our open house is to attract people from different ethnic and religious backgrounds and to help them appreciate and understand, without stereotypes, the Islamic faith," said Khalid Kebbati, graduate student in curriculum and instruction.

Kebbati also said the open house is a multicultural event that helps build a bridge of understanding, communication and tolerance between Muslims and non-Muslims.

To help build this bridge, Kebbati will be speaking about terrorism, tolerance and multi-ethnic communities.

In addition to Kebbati's speech, the MSA has planned a variety of activities for the open house. An audio-visual program will be played on a continual basis throughout the day and will highlight Muslim activity in the United States, women's rights in Islam, polygamy and other often-misunderstood topics.

An art collection with works from the Gulf, Middle East, Far East and Europe, along with calligraphy showing the Islamic art of the Arabic language, will be on display.

"Many people have false ideas about Muslims, and we want to explain who we are, why we are here, and give people a clear idea of what we believe," said Omar Itani, graduate student in civil engineering.

The Muslim Women of Manhattan will prepare food from a collection of worldwide recipes for people to sample during their visit to the Islamic Center.

Visitors can move from one activity to another at their leisure.

"It's pretty much like when visiting a fair in which there are a lot of attractions," Kebbati said.

There are about 100 students from more than eight countries involved in the MSA who want the open house to be a positive reflection of their campus organization.

"The annual open house is a chance to establish a better relationship between the larger community of Manhattan and the Muslim community," MSA president Tawfik Aboellail said.

Baseball falls short of gender equality

It wasn't exactly the nonstop frenzy inspired by Willy Wonka's five golden tickets, but last week's call for a receiving corps nickname did inspire several creative responses.

When all had been e-mailed and reviewed by the Collegian sports staff, however, Craig Hull, sophomore in advertising, offered the best names and thus, the ticket to a free 1999 K-State football highlight video.

Hull offered four suggestions for Aaron Lockett, Quincy Morgan & Co., and since this is such a scientific process, we decided that three were better than one. Therefore, "The Air Club for Men," "Midwest Airlines," and "The Little Apple Air Show," all get some ink. If one of these names catches on, Hull can look back fondly at his creativity. If not, he can rewind the tape.

This week, it's a question instead of a contest that's on my mind. Will a woman ever play major league baseball? This might sound ludicrous, but it was discussed and debated to some degree earlier this week in my History of Baseball class.

The question was prompted by a video on the All-American Girls Professional Baseball League, which began in the early 1940s as an experiment. With most of the nation's men off serving in World War II, the AAGPBL was formed to keep the national pastime alive and provide some form of entertainment. The league was met with heavy skepticism initially and mocked by a fair share of paying customers, but the women involved were not short of skill. They quickly built a reputation as more than just carnival-like entertainment and kept the league alive until the 1950s. The league even inspired the movie, "A League of Their Own," which starred Tom Hanks and Madonna.

All of this stoked the fiery debate of where a woman factors into baseball today, and whether the possibility exists for women to break into America's game.

As macho and male-dominated as sports like football and hockey might be, baseball always has been a good-ole-boys' game. The closest ties a woman has with baseball today is Marge Schott, and I'm not sure any gender would claim her.

Football occasionally has experienced a female kicker at either the high school or junior college level. Basketball always has been ripe with battle of the sexes stories, like tales of former Olympiad Cheryl Miller schooling her younger brother, Indiana Pacers' All-Star Reggie Miller. Even the National Hockey League crossed the gender line when goalie Manon Rheume became the first woman to play in one of the four major sports leagues when she played in a Tampa Bay Lightning exhibition game in 1992.

Baseball hasn't even come close to this, unless you count the Silver Bullets, an ill-fated experiment in which a women's baseball team repeatedly was shelled by minor league competition.

But will there ever be a woman good enough to deserve a shot at major-league baseball? It's a debate that treads a fine line of sexism and reality. More so, a woman capable of breaking down this barrier would have to develop thick skin to endure all the bigotry and questioning that a pioneer inherits, right or wrong. Just ask Jackie Robinson.

To say that a woman could never play major-league baseball is wrong. The fact that boys and girls can compete on the same diamond, often until high school, proves that sex does not decide who can play the game. But that equality often ends at this level, keeping baseball's testosterone-filled church intact. I think that will end someday.

There's scientific proof that humans continue to evolve and develop into better physical beings. With the addition of performance-enhancement drugs and better medical treatment, athletes continue to break records and perform at a level many believed could never be reached. These examples of athletic evolution exist on both sides of the gender line.

Marion Jones is a perfect example. The all-world sprinter could collect five gold medals at the 2000 Olympics. Rheume proved she was good enough to get a shot in the NHL. And the WNBA has proven that talented players like Sheryl Swoopes and Chamique Holdclaw don't always play second to the NBA.

This doesn't mean that the year 2000 has ushered in an era of gender-less sports. It will take a lot of time and patience for a woman to find her name on a MLB starting lineup. But there's nothing outside of sheer prejudice to say otherwise. Eventually, the boys of summer might have to make room for a girl.

ON A STREAK

Baseball team wants to continue momentum with 3-game series

The K-State baseball team, 16-20 overall and 3-14 in the Big 12 Conference, travels to Ames, Iowa, this weekend to play a three-game series against Iowa State (11-28, 3-15).

The Cats will play a double-header Saturday, with the first game starting at noon, and will play again at 1 p.m. Sunday. K-State enters the series on a season-high seven-game winning streak and has scored in double digits in all seven of those wins.

"Right now, we're playing the best ball we've played all year," first baseman Mark English said. "Everyone's playing with a lot of confidence."

"The guys who returned from last year remember that this is the time of year when we started playing good and made up a lot of ground in the race, so we're just going into Iowa State with a lot of confidence."

K-State head coach Mike Clark said the winning streak has given the team the confidence it needs to stay calm and not panic if things go wrong. The team is closing in on the .500 mark, and Clark said the Cats are not out of the mix yet.

"You want to be hot in April and May," Clark said. "Last year, that's when we got hot, and this year we're in the same situation."

"We've put ourselves in a hole in our conference, but we do have opportunities, if we can win, we're in great shape."

K-State will face an Iowa State team that has struggled this season. The Cyclones' pitching staff has a respectable 5.89 ERA, but their offense has only generated 184 runs in 39 games. In comparison, K-State has scored 272 runs in 36 games.

Clark said Iowa State's pitchers will be a good test to see if the Cats' offense can continue to produce. English said the Cats are ready to face a solid Big 12 pitching staff.

"We've proved that we could hit against Oklahoma State," English said. "We hit their best pitchers. We haven't played the best teams, but hopefully we can carry this momentum into Iowa State, because that's when it really matters."

K-State's pitchers have thrown well during the Cats' winning streak. The staff season ERA is 7.35, but Clark said he is happy with their performance during the streak. He said even though K-State is playing its best ball of the year, the team still has some things to work on.

"On defense, we're still making some silly mistakes," Clark said. "We'll take care of it. We're human beings and we just need to take care of the ball a little better."

Women's golf begins post-season play in Texas

By DEREK BOSS

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The regular season is over. Now comes the hard part.

K-State will compete in the fourth annual Big 12 Women's Golf Championship today through Sunday in Lubbock, Texas.

The 6,523-yard, par-72 Lubbock Country Club golf course will be the site of the tournament, which not only features the top teams in the conference but in the nation as well.

Nine Big 12 schools come into today's competition ranked in the top 50 in the latest MasterCard Collegiate Golf Rankings, including three in the top 25: No. 9 Oklahoma State, No. 14 Texas and No. 23 Oklahoma.

In fact, the Cowboys are the defending conference champions, defeating the Longhorns by two strokes in last year's Big 12 tournament in Boulder, Colo.

Last year's individual champion also is making a return to defend her title. Oklahoma State's Maria Boden finished first last year with a score of 219 and now sits as the highest-ranked individual in this year's field at No. 20 in the nation.

That optimum talent level is what is facing five Wildcats who made the trip to the Lone Star State: freshmen Elise Carpentier and Miranda Smith, sophomores Edie Murdoch and Lindsay Hammerschmidt and junior Traci Benninga.

Out of that group, Benninga and Hammerschmidt are the only Cats with Big 12 Championship experience.

Benninga has competed in the tournament twice, finishing 58th her freshman year and 60th in 1999, while Hammerschmidt will be making her second postseason appearance after placing 59th last year.

However, that lack of experience is something head coach Kristi Knight said K-State will use to its advantage in Texas.

"We have a chance to surprise some people," Knight said. "Nobody expects anything from us. Probably the only people who believe in Kansas State is us."

"The girls can have a good showing, and they are looking forward to the opportunity to turn some heads."

K-State will have a chance to do that today, as the Cats try to reverse their luck from a year ago.

At last year's Big 12 Championship, K-State shot a 318-322-326 — 966 for a dismal 12th place finish.

The Cats' best-ever postseason showing was a 10th-place performance at the inaugural conference tournament in 1997.

4 K-State golfers earn honors due to academic performance

Four student-athletes on the women's golf squad were recognized Tuesday by the Big 12 Conference for their excellence in the classroom, as well as in athletics.

Junior Traci Benninga and sophomores Lindsay Hammerschmidt and Edie Murdoch were named to the 2000 All-Big 12 Academic first-team, while senior Carrie Chambers was awarded second-team honors.

Benninga and Hammerschmidt aren't new to the list, as both are making their second consecutive appearances on the team.

Hammerschmidt earned honorable mention status a year ago, while Benninga was a first-team selection once again.

It is also Murdoch's second straight year to receive honors, but she was ineligible her freshman year because of her redshirt status.

These three returning award-winners are among 33 repeat performers on the squad from previous women's golf academic all-conference teams.

Athletes are nominated by each institution's director of student-athlete support services as well as the media-relations office. The Big 12 Academic first team consists of 40 members maintaining a 3.2 GPA or better, while the six-member second team must have a 3.0 to 3.19 GPA to qualify.

K-State signs Canadian golfer

Wildcat head coach Kristi Knight announced the signing of Christine Boucher, April 13, to the women's golf squad.

Boucher, a native of Cap-de-la-Madeleine, Quebec, comes to K-State as a highly touted recruit.

She was the 1998 Quebec Junior match play champion as well as the seventh-place finisher in the 1998 Canadian Junior Tournament, shooting a 76-75-76 — 227.

"Christine is one of the top players in Canada," Knight said. "She has quite a bit of tournament experience and will be a great addition to our team."

Boucher marks the second Canadian golfer the Wildcats have signed in as many years, as Knight inked current freshman Elise Carpentier a year ago.

Ryan's minor-league team fares well

By JIM VERTUNO
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

ROUND ROCK, Texas — Put Nolan Ryan's name on just about anything in Texas and they will come. Put it on a baseball team and they come by the thousands.

The Round Rock Express, the Houston Astros' Double-A team, was bought by the Hall of Fame pitcher, his son Reid and Houston businessman Don Sanders. They moved it here from Jackson, Miss., electrifying this Austin suburb.

The Texas League team built a $25 million stadium, and season-ticket sales were so hot that the club cut them off after 4,500. A sellout crowd of 10,699 attended the home-opener last Sunday against El Paso.

"People are excited," said Ryan, who threw the stadium's ceremonial first pitch. "I played in the minors about a year and half. Obviously, the product has improved."

A lot. On Ryan's first minor-league team in 1965, he played on a Virginia high school field in a hand-me-down uniform that was too small.

"I had better uniforms when I was in high school," he said. "Back in my days, the minor leagues were struggling to survive."

Today, the Express play in a stadium lined with luxury boxes and dress in locker rooms that rival those at major colleges.

Reid Ryan, Nolan's oldest son, suggested the idea of minor-league baseball to his dad after his own baseball career fizzled out.

"My original dream was to make it as a player," said 28-year-old Reid, who pitched in the minors from 1994 to '96. "I never had the blazing fastball."

But he had a father who helped him and Sanders buy the Jackson Generals for $5 million.

The next move was to get the team to the Austin area, which had been the nation's largest metropolitan area without a professional baseball franchise.

Twice in the 1990s, Round Rock and Austin residents had voted against proposals to spend tax money to help build stadiums for minor-league teams. This time, it was approved overwhelmingly.

"It was a risky move," Reid Ryan said. "But we had faith this could work. We had done our research."

The research showed a community enjoying an economic boom because of high-tech industry. The metro area had grown to about 1 million, and many transplants came from cities that had baseball.

"Round Rock was where we needed to be," Reid Ryan said. "People here want baseball."

Dell Computer Corp. got involved, too, buying the rights to put its name on Dell Diamond.

Nolan Ryan acknowledges his name helps sell the team. It was the fans who voted to name the team the Express, taking it from the pitching legend's "Ryan Express," the nickname for his locomotive-like fastball.

"The fact we're from Texas, people are familiar with me and Reid, there was a comfort level that we brought here," Ryan said. "They would have been suspicious of somebody from outside the state. We're not going to come in and be gone in a year or so."

For Round Rock fans, the stadium itself, with its limestone facade, is a reason to go to the games. It certainly is the gem of the eight-team Texas League.

The 7,816 fixed seats all have chair backs and every concession stand allows a view of the field. The scoreboard has instant replay. Twenty-four skyboxes wrap around the top deck; priced at $22,500 and $27,500, they sold out in three weeks.

Relays back after 2-year absence

By MICHAEL NOLL
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Kansas Relays have returned after a two-year leave of absence.

The relays, traditionally one of the nation's most prestigious relays and one of the state's oldest and best, had not taken place since 1997 due to renovations to the University of Kansas, Memorial Stadium and Hersberger Track.

In the relay's first day Wednesday, K-State freshman Heather Robinson, halfway through the women's heptathlon, started the meet for the Cats by grabbing fifth place.

K-State assistant coach Ron Grigg said the relay teams should perform well.

"The sprint medley and 4-by-400 relay have a good chance to make it into the finals and do very well," Grigg said.

Junior Istvan Nagy also is expected to perform well in the middle-distance races, Grigg said.

In addition to the college athletes, many high schools also will be competing in the meet. As a result, K-State is trying to perform well to impress the high schoolers that they might recruit, Grigg said.

"There will be a lot of high schools there, so we want to put on a good show," Grigg said. "We'll be watching the high school kids to see who's performing well. We're looking at juniors. We want to get a look at the future, get a look at the kids before the state meet."

While the entire men's team is in Lawrence, the top women's performers are at the National Invitational, Grigg said.

"They invite the top-15 teams in the country," Grigg said. "They allow two athletes per school in each event."

As usual, the middle and distance runners, Korene Hinds, Amy Mortimer, Annie Wetterhus and Amanda Crouse, are expected to lead the pack for the Cats. This time, however, the throwers will stack up well against the competition, too, Grigg said.

"The distance runners and throwers will compete very well," Grigg said. "The distance runners are as good as anybody."

In the shorter races, the sprinters will have to run well to defeat their tough competition, Grigg said.

"The southern teams usually have very good sprinters," Grigg said. "But our sprinters will give it a good show."

Also expected to do well for the Cats is Carmen Wright in the long jump and 400 meter hurdles.

Wright should enter the long jump event with quite a bit of confidence. In her last meet, the Mt. Sac Relays, she exceeded her old personal best by five inches with a jump of 19 feet, 4 3/4 inches.

Poll finds most Americans want trigger locks, stricter enforcement

By WILL LESTER
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Most Americans say they want tougher gun controls, including a majority who favor a law requiring that guns be sold with trigger locks, an Associated Press poll finds. But people are split on the best way to reduce violence: better enforcement of present laws or passage of tougher ones.

"We need better enforcement," said Jeff Teasdale, a printing plant supervisor from Baraboo, Wis. "I don't think the laws right now are being enforced."

But he also favored the requirement for trigger locks, saying: "It would keep a lot of kids from getting hurt."

Teacher Joyce Bell from Wilmington, Del., who was with her 11-year-old daughter near the Washington Monument on Wednesday, said, "I want new gun laws. There shouldn't be any guns, in my opinion."

The poll found that 42 percent thought stricter enforcement was more likely to cut gun violence, while 33 percent said enacting tougher gun laws was a better approach. Neither option was best for one-fifth of those in the poll conducted for The AP by ICR of Media, Pa.

The survey reflected a shift from an AP poll taken immediately after the Columbine High School shootings in Littleton, Colo., a year ago Thursday, when more people said tougher laws were the answer.

The earlier poll showed just over half of Americans said more gun laws would be more effective, while four in 10 picked tougher enforcement. But by late August, people had shifted to thinking stricter enforcement was a better way to reduce violence.

Opponents of gun control who are trying to block the enactment of more laws often call for better enforcement of current gun laws.

When not asked to make a choice between the two options, six in 10 in the new poll said they supported stricter gun-control laws, a number that has remained relatively constant in most polls before and after the Columbine shooting that left 15 dead, including the two student gunmen.

Seven in 10 women favor tougher gun-control laws, while half the men said they felt that way in the AP poll of 829 people taken Friday through Tuesday. It had an error margin of plus or minus 4 percentage points.

Just over half of those polled said background checks for gun purchases help reduce the number of crimes committed with guns, while four in 10 said they do not.

More than four of five women support requiring trigger locks, while two-thirds of men said they favored the idea. Seven of 10 gun owners in the poll said they backed trigger locks, but gun owners were split on the overall question of more gun control laws.

Maryland earlier this month became the first state to enact a law requiring that all guns sold in the state must have external trigger locks, starting in October. After 2003, new handguns will have to be equipped with built-in locks.

Even as gun legislation has been stymied on Capitol Hill, the trigger lock movement has been gaining momentum nationally and President Clinton has been encouraging a growing move in the states to deal with firearms safety questions.

In March, New York's Republican governor, George Pataki, called for mandatory trigger locks for all guns. Days later, Smith & Wesson — the nation's largest gun manufacturer — agreed to provide external safety locks on all its handguns within 60 days and internal locks within two years.

White House officials say GOP drug plan full of holes

By KAREN GULLO
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The White House is criticizing a Republican plan to offer prescription drug insurance to senior citizens as a plan that won't cover millions of older Americans and will be too expensive for many, particularly women.

"It's underfunded, unlikely to be available to all (Medicare) beneficiaries and inevitably ... unaffordable to people with disabilities and probably millions of seniors," Secretary of Health and Human Services Donna Shalala said Thursday.

The GOP plan, as outlined by House Speaker Dennis Hastert last week, calls for private health plans to offer drug benefits and government subsidies to pay drug costs for low-income seniors. While many of the details have yet to be worked out, Republicans said the plan would lower drug prices, give seniors more coverage choice and help the neediest Americans.

The White House has its own plan to provide prescription drug coverage under Medicare, the federal health program for the elderly and disabled. With many lawmakers out of town for the Easter holiday, administration officials took the opportunity to point out flaws in the GOP plan and show how their plan would help more people.

"To us, it still seems like a Swiss-cheese plan with more holes than substance," said Gene Sperling, head of the president's National Economic Council, at a White House briefing.

Republicans accused the administration of jumping the gun with its criticism, saying that when all the fine print has been worked out they will have a comprehensive plan for all seniors.

"The White House is taking shots in the dark," said John Freehery, Hastert's spokesman. "We are still flushing out the details of the plan. We believe we are going to have a good plan for all seniors."

Sperling said the GOP plan to provide subsidies to cover drug costs for seniors at the poverty level would leave out 6 million Medicare beneficiaries who have no drug coverage but have incomes above the poverty line — which he calculated at about $12,500 a year for singles and $16,875 per couple.

Republicans are said to be looking at provisions that would limit seniors' out-of-pocket costs to between $2,000 and $3,000 a year and would establish a cap at which the government would step in and bear the cost of drug expenses.

The White House plan, which will cost $195 billion over 10 years, would provide drug benefits to all 39 million Medicare beneficiaries, paying up to $10,000 in drug costs annually for a $26 monthly premium.

It is not yet known what premiums would be under the GOP plan. Sperling predicted drug benefits provided by private insurers — a cornerstone of the GOP plan — probably would end up being too expensive for many Medicare beneficiaries.

The coverage would work much like drug benefits under private supplemental policies such as Medigap, which charge high premiums that increase as policy holders age, he said.

Discovery of heart suggests dinosaurs were warm-blooded animals

By PAUL RECER
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The remains of a 66 million-year-old dinosaur suggest the extinct creatures were warmblooded — not coldblooded as once believed — and capable of the swift and sustained motion typical of modern birds and mammals.

A modern medical X-ray of a dinosaur fossil named Willo found clear evidence that the animal had four heart chambers that sent blood directly to and from the lungs and then pumped the oxygen-rich blood to the body through a single arched aorta, similar to how the human heart works.

"The single aorta completely separates the oxygen-rich blood from the oxygen-poor blood and sends it to all parts of the body," said Dale A. Russell, senior research curator at the North Carolina Museum of Natural Sciences and a paleontologist at North Carolina State University.

"The single aorta is really important," said Russell, co-author of the study appearing Friday in the journal Science. "This challenges some of the most fundamental theories about how and when dinosaurs evolved."

Most reptiles have three-chambered hearts, but even in those with four chambers, such as the crocodile, the blood is pumped through double arteries that mix oxygen-heavy blood with oxygen-lean blood, said Russell.

Coldblooded reptiles are dependent on the environment for body heat. Warmblooded mammals and birds generate their own body heat and are more tolerant of temperature extremes. Birds and mammals also have more physical endurance and can be swifter.

Some dinosaur experts said discovery of the fossilized heart will change basic views about the dinosaur and send researchers scrambling to do more X-ray studies of intact specimens.

"It's fantastic. It's way cool," Jack Horner, a famed dinosaur researcher at Montana State University in Bozeman, said of the discovery. "It is a landmark in the field."

Horner said finding the heart in the fossilized remains strongly suggests that all dinosaurs were warm-blooded. If verified by other studies that a rock-hard mass in the fossilized chest is a heart, it will mark the first time that scientists have been able to study the cardiac system of dinosaurs.

The discovery came in the remains of a member of a group of dinosaurs known as Tescelosaurus, or marvelous lizard. The precise species has not been identified, but researchers have called it Willo in honor of the wife of a rancher who owns the discovery site in South Dakota.

Russell said the animal was about the size of a pony and weighed about 660 pounds. A long, bony tail gave it a total length of about 13 feet. It had short legs, ate plants and probably was very fast to survive in a world where giant meat eaters ruled. "It probably liked to live in brushy terrain, around deadfalls and could probably go through that terrain just like a torpedo," Russell said. Big animals would have a hard time following, so the Willo probably did quite well, he said.

"This animal lived near the end of the age of reptiles, so it was highly evolved," he said. This suggests that by the end of the dinosaur era, about 65 million years ago, many, if not all, of the dinosaurs had complex hearts and high metabolic rates, Russell said.

Michael Hammer, a co-author of the study, found the nearly intact dinosaur fossil in Harding County, S.D., in 1993. The specimen was recovered without disturbing the dark mass in the chest cavity.

It was suspected that the mass could be soft tissue that somehow fossilized with the animal's bones. Usually, dinosaur specimens bear no trace of soft tissue, which usually decays before it can become fossilized.

Dr. Andrew A. Kuzmitch, an Ashland, Ore., physician and amateur paleontologist, later examined the specimen with a CT scan, a form of medical X-ray that gives details of internal structure. He said seven cardiologists looked at the images and identified the object as a heart with separated pumping chambers similar to the human heart.

Paul Fisher, director of an imaging lab at the North Carolina State University veterinary school, enhanced the CT scan data into three-dimensional images. He said the presence of a four-chambered heart became obvious.

"You could see both ventricles (lower heart chambers) and the aorta (an artery)," said Fisher, the first author of the study.

Fisher said two veterinarian experts have looked at the images and agreed that the chest mass is the fossil of a four-chambered heart.

Developing a four-chambered heart and a high metabolic rate could have been essential to survival for dinosaurs like Willo, which would have been choice morsels for the big meat eaters, such as Tyrannosaurus

Some dinosaur experts said discovery of the fossilized heart will change basic views about the dinosaur and send researchers scrambling to do more X-ray studies of intact specimens.

Rex, Fisher said.

Coldblooded animals are sluggish in chilly weather and would have been easy prey.

Horner said because of the Willo study by North Carolina scientists, he and other researchers now will start doing CT scans on any intact dinosaur fossils they find.

"There are several around like that and I think we'll all start looking at them," Horner said.

Among the effects of the heart discovery, Horner said, is a boost for the idea that birds evolved from dinosaurs, a theory that is becoming more widely accepted by paleontologists. Birds also have four-chambered hearts.

Gunman kills 2, wounds 3 after dispute with homeowners' group

By SCOTT THOMSEN
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

PEORIA, Ariz. — Richard Glassel was known as the hothead who was furious at groundskeepers for trimming the shrubs outside his retirement-community condominium.

The condo association was so unnerved by Glassel that it obtained a restraining order against him. When he finally moved out, he allegedly took a chainsaw to his place, tearing up sheetrock and slicing cabinets.

Neighbors hadn't seen him in months — until Wednesday. That's when police say he stormed into a community association board meeting with guns blazing, killing two people and wounding three others.

"When he moved, I was glad he trashed his house and didn't take his frustrations out on us. Now, we feel especially lucky," said Art Rausch, who lived across the street from Glassel.

At first, members of the Ventana Lakes homeowners association didn't even recognize the 61-year-old Glassel, since they hadn't seen him in more than a year.

"He just came in, stood in the rear of the room and started firing," said Sheldon "Smokey" Stover, 76, who shouted warnings when the gunshots erupted.

During the shooting, according to court documents, the gunman said he was getting even with the association for all the problems the members had caused him.

About 50 people dropped to the floor, scrambled under chairs or huddled together as the bullets tore through the Ventana Lakes Yacht Club, where the homeowners meeting was underway.

When Glassel's gun jammed, Sheldon and five others tackled him, holding him on the floor until police arrived. Police found two more loaded guns in his jacket and a large stash of ammunition in the rental moving truck he had driven to the meeting, Sgt. Russ Scarborough said.

"You're very lucky there weren't more people killed," said Thomas Mangan, an agent with the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms.

Glassel was in jail Thursday on murder and attempted murder charges. During a court appearance in the middle of the night, he requested a lawyer. One was not immediately appointed.

Nila Lynn, 69, died of a gunshot wound to the back. Esther LaPlante, 75, was fatally shot in the head and shoulder.

Paul Ettinger, 69, who was shot in the chest, was in fair condition Thursday. Gilbert McCurdy, 63, underwent foot surgery late Wednesday and was in good condition. Charles Yankowski, 69, was treated and released.

A fourth person also was hospitalized after the shooting, but not for a gunshot wound. Police had no details Thursday on the injury.

The association sued Glassel and obtained a restraining order in 1998 to keep him from harassing or intimidating the groundskeepers after he allegedly shoved a property manager, said Penny Koepke, an attorney for the community association.

Trial begins for alleged conspiracy plot

By JAMAL HALABY
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

AMMAN, Jordan — A trial opened Thursday for 28 men charged with plotting to attack U.S. and Israeli tourists in Jordan over the New Year's holiday.

The men, who allegedly are linked to accused terrorist Osama bin Laden, plotted to destabilize public security, military prosecutor-general Lt. Col. Mahmoud Obeidat told the State Security Court. Reading the indictment, Obeidat said the defendants possessed and manufactured explosives to be used against U.S. and Israeli targets during Millennium celebrations.

Fifteen defendants — 13 Jordanians of Palestinian descent, an Iraqi and an Algerian — were in court and have been in custody since December. The others are believed to be outside Jordan and are being tried in absentia. They include Jordanians, Palestinians and a Yemeni.

If convicted, the defendants face the death penalty.

Obeidat told the three judges that the suspects were affiliated with an outlawed group involved in a conspiracy to carry out terrorist attacks in Jordan.

He did not name the group in court. Earlier, though, he told reporters the suspects were linked to al-Qaida — the base — a terrorist organization allegedly headed by bin Laden. The Saudi dissident is wanted for the 1998 bombing of U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania that killed 224 people.

Jordanian officials have said the 28 suspects planned to attack U.S. and Israeli tourists at sites such as Mount Nebo, where tradition says Moses saw the Promised Land, and at the spot by the Jordan River where some believe Jesus was baptized.

An appointed defense lawyer, Jawad Yunis, said after the hearing that the prosecution's case would not stand up.

"The defendants have nothing to do with Osama bin Laden," he said. "The government is sending a message to the Americans and the Israelis that it is protecting them to get help from the world's No. 1 power."

The defendants — most with long beards and wearing blue prison uniforms — were escorted into court by soldiers armed with automatic weapons. They embraced one another once police had removed their handcuffs.

During the 75-minute hearing, most of the defendants refused to enter pleas. They frequently interrupted the proceedings with the Muslim cry of "Allahu Akbar," or "God is great." They accused Obeidat of falsifying the charges and said the justice system was infidel.

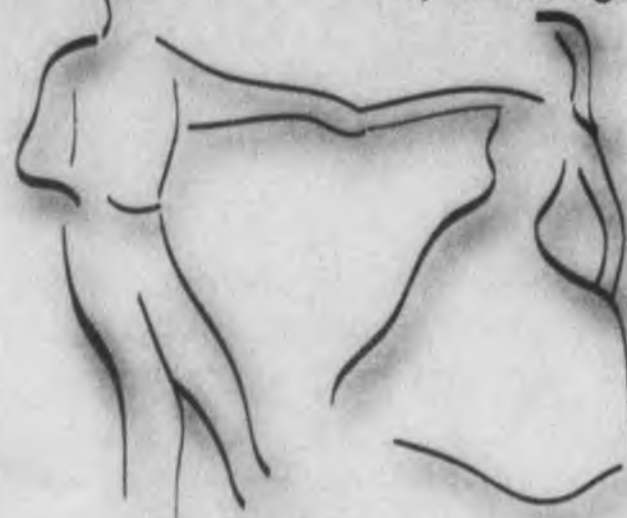

"You are guilty because you shunned God's doctrine," defendant Khader Abu Hoshier, 36, said when the presiding judge asked for his plea.

Linda Cottle, senior in wildlife biology, paints the face of 6-year-old Crystal Hale, Manhattan resident, as part of the second-annual Sunset Zoological Park Eggstravaganza on April 4, 1999. Cottle was part of the docent volunteer group that helps out at the zoo throughout the year. The event was education-based rather than a typical Easter egg hunt.

Sunset Zoo to offer educational games about egg-laying animals

The Easter Bunny doesn't have to stuff 3,000 plastic eggs with candy and prizes.

But Eileen Bauer, marketing development director at Sunset Zoological Park, and her docents do.

The group has been preparing for Sunset Zoo's third annual Eggstravaganza, which will be from 1 to 4 p.m. Sunday.

Heidi Kautz, gate attendant at the zoo, said admission price for the event is the same as the normal zoo entrance fee. Regular admission is $3 for adults and children over 13, $1.50 for children between the ages of five and 12 and free for those 4-years-old and younger.

Kautz said the docents are a big help in putting on functions similar to these.

"We couldn't put things on like that if they weren't here helping," Kautz said.

The event does not center around the Easter holiday, and there is no egg hunt. Instead, Eggstravaganza focuses on education of egg-laying animals. Games and trivia questions will be asked about ladybugs, crocodiles, platypuses and other egg-laying animals.

"It is still going to be a lot of fun for the kids," Kautz said. "It is a chance to celebrate our egg-laying animals."

There will be several booths for the kids, each focusing on a different egg-laying animal. Visitors also will be able to enjoy the rest of the park.

"They also will get free roam of the zoo so they can go around and look at the animals," Kautz said.

Along with the educational events, those in attendance will be able to get their pictures taken with Flopsy the bunny.

Bauer said there are a number of reasons people should attend Eggstravaganza, including the fact it is a different way to spend the holiday.

"It's a nice way to spend a Sunday afternoon, especially an Easter Sunday afternoon," she said.

Last year's event and festivities drew a crowd of more than 640 children and adults to the Easter activity.

Sponsors of the event include KMAN-AM 1350, KMKF-FM 101.5 and Cox Communications. N-Zone Sports Wear also has donated T-shirts for the event.

Scott Haverkamp, co-owner of N-Zone Sports Wear, said they have a good working relationship with the zoo and are happy to help with such events.

"We thought it would be nice to help them out, and it is for a good cause," he said.

"It is still going to be a lot of fun for the kids. It is a chance to celebrate our egg-laying animals."

Butterfly-garden construction begins at Tuttle Creek

BY ERIN SCHNEWEIS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Tuttle Creek State Park will be doing its part Saturday to enhance the beauty of the Earth.

In celebration of Earth Day, Tuttle Creek will be constructing a permanent butterfly garden.

Stacey Howe, AmeriCorps member, said the river-pond section of Tuttle Creek is divided into two parts. One part is the day park, and the other is the campground section. She said a bridge divides the two parts of the park.

"The butterfly garden is going to be located right next to that bridge, but it is on the day-use side," Howe said. "It will be utilized by both the campground and the day use users."

The outdoor, U-shaped butterfly garden will be 10 feet wide by 30 feet deep. It will have railroad ties outlining the garden, and flowers will fill the inside section. A bench will be in front of the garden for visitors to sit and enjoy the view.

Todd Lovin, park manager, said he is excited about the butterfly garden.

"It is a neat little project," he said. "The river-pond area has some limited wildlife viewing opportunities."

Lovin said the garden will help bring down some of those limitations. He said it will be a good place to take pictures, look at nature and serve an educational purpose.

Howe said they have been working on the project since January. She said all of their planning is going to come into affect with the help of volunteers.

"We are asking for volunteers to come out this Saturday," she said. "We will meet at the park office at 8:30 a.m. and we should be done by 11 or 12. It shouldn't take very long if a lot of people come out and help."

Kaw Valley Greenhouses, Blueville Nursery and Wamego Floral Co. are donating the flowers to fill the butterfly garden.

Sharon Wahl, marketing at Wamego Floral, said the store is donating 15 plants to the cause. She said the plants are a new variety designed to attract butterflies.

Wahl said the popularity of the park was the reason she chose to help with the garden.

"It's local to us, and we all use the Tuttle Creek facilities," Wahl said.

LOVING JESUS

Members of PRAJN, a new group formed to promote Christianity, march through campus Thursday evening. The group was formed this semester and is eager to introduce Jesus to the students and faculty of the university.

Erika Cannon, president of KSU Gospel Services, said people walked in remembrance of Christ's death and resurrection.

"We are uniting for Easter to say 'We love Jesus.' It is a form of acknowledging that he is the center of our lives," she said.

Clinton says Elan should see his father

By TERENCE HUNT

AP WHITE HOUSE CORRESPONDENT

WASHINGTON, D.C. — President Clinton said Thursday that Elan Gonzalez should be promptly reunited with his father, saying there's now no argument to keep them apart after a federal court ruled the boy cannot leave the United States.

"I think he should be reunited in as prompt and orderly way as possible," Clinton said.

Clinton spoke a day after a three-judge panel of the 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Atlanta said that Elan must remain in the United States until the court decides whether he should get an asylum hearing. A hearing was set for May 11.

"There's now no conceivable argument for his not being able to be reunited with his son," Clinton said. "That is what the lawful process has said. The immigration law is clear, and the determination of the INS and a federal court are clear."

The president spoke in response to questions in the Rose Garden as he welcomed Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat at the opening of discussions about the Middle East peace process.

Clinton discussed the Elan case with Attorney General Janet Reno for 45 minutes on a flight from Oklahoma City, where they attended the dedication of a memorial to the 168 people killed five years ago in the deadliest terrorist attack in America's history.

"I think he should be reunited with his son," the president said. "That is the law. And the main argument of the family in Miami for not doing so has now been removed. Their main argument was if we let him go back to his father before the court rules, he might go back to Cuba. The court has now said he shouldn't go back to Cuba. The Justice Department agrees with that."

White House press secretary Joe Lockhart said Clinton was leaving the decisions in Reno's hands.

"The attorney general is leading the effort," Lockhart said. "The president has been briefed and has had input. Is she making the decisions here? Yes."

Lockhart declined to discuss Clinton's conversation with Reno about the case but said the president believes the attorney general has moved forward in a deliberate way which he believes is appropriate, allowing all sides to have their say.

Lockhart said the court ruling Wednesday should be reassuring to the Miami relatives fighting to keep the child, while at the same time clearing the way for the boy to be reunited with his father, Juan Miguel Gonzalez, who came here from Cuba.

By saying the boy should not leave, the court has removed a concern of the Miami relatives, Lockhart said. "They now should move forward and, in conjunction with the Justice Department, allow the boy to be reunited with his father."

Canadian teen-ager stabs 4 students, 1 worker

Attack marks 1-year anniversary of shooting.

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

OTTAWA, Ontario — A 15-year-old boy stabbed four students and a school employee on Thursday and also cut himself before handing the knife over to the principal, police said.

Witnesses said the youth, described as a loner, suddenly lashed out at the school worker and other students at Cairine Wilson High School in the Ottawa area.

All five victims and the student with the knife were hospitalized.

None had life-threatening wounds.

Rebecca Greenwood, 16, said one of the victims was playing cards when the attacker came from behind and stabbed him in the back and head.

"He just stabbed the guy sitting closest to where he was coming from," Greenwood said.

Police said the knife-wielding youth wounded himself. He was under arrest and would be charged when released from the hospital, police said.

The attack at an Ottawa high school occurred on the first anniversary of the Columbine High School killings in Littleton, Colo., although there was no immediate indication that Thursday's violence was linked to the anniversary of the shooting rampage.

Deputy police chief Vince Bevan said the suspect knew the first person he stabbed, but there was no evidence that any victims were targeted. Principal Mike Jordan calmed the youth, who handed him the knife about 15 minutes later, police said.

After the lunchtime stabbings, some students formed a prayer circle and sang "Amazing Grace" outside the school as others sobbed openly.

Students described the suspect as quiet with few friends.

In Littleton in 1999, two Columbine students killed 13 people before committing suicide with their guns.

A week after the Columbine shootings, a youth at a Taber, Alberta, high school shot to death one student and wounded another.

Canadian schools have tightened security in recent weeks due to various threats of possible violence around the anniversary of last year's shootings.

In New Brunswick, a high school was almost empty Thursday after threats of violence to coincide with the Columbine anniversary.

Banuelos said the LAPD is recruiting to maintain the strength of the department.

"We received money last year from the crime bill to hire 500-plus new officers," he said. "In addition, we are trying to keep up with the mass retirement of officers who have been on the force for the 30 years since Vietnam."

"Although the most prevalent fact is the way the economy is going, people are going to other fields instead of law enforcement," he said.

Joining the force doesn't just mean patrol duty, Banuelos said. "We have over 250 assignments.

One is patrol but there are still 249 others. We have assignments that you can utilize your degree," he said.

"We have officers who produce police videos. A person with a speech degree could work in press relations. We have officers with computer degrees that develop the force's Web site."

Tim Henderson, assistant director of Career and Employment Services, said this is the first time the LAPD has visited campus.

"It is a neat opportunity. The size of the department and the opportunities are a good informative opportunity for students," Henderson said. "It is a great exploration tool for students."

Fred Mitchell, a Toby's employee, said the damage was extensive to the rides, and would be in the millions of dollars. Two employees were unharmed when they rode out the storm next to a large truck.

Western Resources crews from throughout the region worked through the day Thursday to restore power. Only a few blocks of the city had power immediately after the storm. Most was restored by 4 a.m.

"This is nothing like we've ever seen in Parsons," said Martha Walters, a city administrative assistant. "We've never had damage like this."

The state activated its Emergency Operations Center to take reports of the damage and direct state efforts to provide relief in the damaged areas, said Joy Moser of the Adjutant General's Department. She said the Federal Emergency Management Agency was notified.

Moser said 22 Kansas Army National Guard personnel were in Parsons to block entry to the town and protect it against looting.

City manager Glen Welden said it could more than a week before a damage assessment was complete.

Equestrian added to womens' sports roster

By NICK BRATKOVIC
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State Department of Intercollegiate Athletics welcomed women's equestrian into the Wildcat's varsity sports family on Friday.

"Equestrian is organized by zones, and other teams are recommended in this area," athletic director Max Urick said. "It is a unique women's activity that we want to designate as the next women's varsity sport."

"In our opinion, it gives us the greatest potential to distinguish us on a national basis. It is really a unique fit."

Competition will begin next year, and the university is looking at building a world-class equine Education and Activities Center through private-sector funds. In the meantime, the equestrian team will compete in Weber Hall and other venues while private funds are raised.

Urick said the decision was a difficult one for K-State to make, but equestrian was perhaps the best choice.

"I think it is a unique day for Kansas State University," Urick said. "It is a day of mixed feelings. I feel good about adding equestrian today. The tough decision is what not to add. The time might come when we have the opportunity to recommend soccer and softball. The time is not now."

TITLE IX INFO
Discover the reasoning behind the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics decision to make equestrian the next varsity sport.

Mary Molt, chairwoman of the Intercollegiate Athletic Council, said other programs also were strong choices.

"It is not easy making a decision between the different programs," Molt said.

Equestrian was chosen as the new women's sport over soccer, softball, and swimming and diving. All are good sports, Urick said, and it might not be his personal preference, but the university might add an additional sport in the future. Urick said another sport mentioned previously, bowling, probably would not be an option as it would have had minimal effect on Title IX.

Title IX, a federal law introduced in 1972, demands equal participation for men and women. Without the new team, K-State has a 63-percent male to 37-percent female participation level. Urick said the university will be able to add between 40 and 110 female participants with equestrian. Athletic department officials said they expect to have about 65 female athletes participating in women's equestrian in the future.

Another reason for the decision was the partnership the athletic department will form with the

— Max Urick,
athletic director

Department of Animal Sciences and Industry.

"The equestrian-interest level for K-State is pretty much a natural, being that we are a land-grant institution," said Jack Riley, professor of animal science.

The sport of equestrian also rapidly is growing and continues to gain acceptance as a varsity sport, after being introduced in 1998. K-State officials said they believe the team will be able to be competitive. While the sport still is new to the NCAA and the Big 12 Conference, Urick said K-State will not have to travel far for competition. Equestrian teams compete in zones, and Urick said K-State will compete in Region 2.

"One of the unique things about equestrian is that all levels of competition are able to compete on the same plane," Urick said.

Teams travel to event sites for competitions and must ride horses owned by the host college. Team members also are not allowed to ride the horses or use their own saddles before preparation, and each team rides a horse without knowing the riding habits of the animal.

Equestrian riders are judged on their ability to control and show the horse while maintaining the correct riding position. Competition is broken down into a variety of categories such as horsemanship, which refers to the Western style of riding. Competition is designed to evaluate the rider's ability to execute in sequence with the horse.

K-State officials said they hope alumni will donate a majority of the horses to the program.

Annual zoo event teaches children of eggs, animals

The geese sunning themselves in the grass drew the girl's attention.

"Mama, they're laying eggs," 5-year-old Karolann Savage said.

The geese weren't laying eggs, her mother Debbie Savage said, but eggs were the focus of the 6th Annual Eggstravaganza Sunday afternoon at Sunset Zoological Park.

Eileen Bauer, marketing director at the zoo, said the event is different than most Easter events, because it doesn't include an egg hunt.

"Kids don't have to fight for their eggs," she said. "Plus there's an educational quality."

Instead of hunting for eggs, children went to different booths to play games and answer trivia questions about egg-laying animals.

For Savage's three kids, that was the best part of the day.

"They liked doing the quizzes and finding out about the animals at the tables," she said.

One table asked children to put the stages of a frog's life in order. They were to start with an egg and

Gonzalezes celebrate reunion

By CALVIN WOODWARD

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Elian Gonzalez spent a secluded Easter with his father, insulated from the clatter in two nation's capitals and a shaken Miami over the armed raid used to take him away.

"Finally," said his father's lawyer, "some silence around them."

After a day of raw anger, street fires and violence in the Little Havana neighborhood, Miami fell quiet for Easter celebration Sunday morning, still under tight police control after more than 350 arrests.

"We will celebrate in tears," said Sergio Perez, a Miami neighbor of the relatives who kept Elian for five months until federal agents brandishing guns burst through their door before dawn Saturday and seized him. Later Sunday, scores of chanting protesters returned to the neighborhood.

In Washington, near the heavily secured air base where the 6-year-old Cuban boy is staying, a congressional Republican leader sickened by the use of force said hearings were certain on Capitol Hill.

"This is a frightening event, that American citizens now can expect that the executive branch on their own can decide on whether to raid a home," said House Republican whip Tom DeLay of Texas, joining criticism made by George W. Bush, the presumptive GOP

Pope gives Easter Mass to 150,000

By FRANCES D'EMILIO
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

VATICAN CITY — Capping a grueling Holy Week schedule, a weary-sounding Pope John Paul II offered Easter wishes for peace in 61 languages and called on the world Sunday to end racism and xenophobia.

So many Holy Year pilgrims, tourists and Romans turned out for the pope's late-morning Mass in St. Peter's Square that by the time he delivered his Easter message at noon, the crowd, numbering close to 150,000, was spilling over into the boulevard leading to the Vatican.

The faithful passed through metal detectors recently installed in the colonnade around the square as part of security concerns over the heavy Holy Year schedule of public appearances by the pope.

Sounding tired toward the end of the two-hour appearance, John Paul expressed hope that the sense of life associated with Easter might "overturn the hardness of our hearts" and impel individuals and states to full respect for human rights.

Praying for the success of peace efforts around the world, including in Africa and Latin America, the pope cited persistent tensions in the Middle East, vast areas of Asia, and some parts of Europe.

Teen planned stabbing to mark Columbine anniversary

By TOM COHEN
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TORONTO — A 15-year-old boy accused of stabbing five people at his high school apparently planned the attacks to coincide with the first anniversary of the massacre in Littleton, Colo., police said Sunday.

Detective Sgt. Ken Doyle said comments by witnesses and other evidence indicated the attacks Thursday were tied to the anniversary of the April 20, 1999, shootings at Columbine High School, where two students killed 13 people before turning their guns on themselves.

The stabbings Thursday began at about 11:21 a.m. — the exact same time of day that the Columbine shootings started.

Doyle refused to provide specifics about the evidence. Sgt. Leo Janveau said police had some evidence of planning prior to the stabbings, which left small puncture wounds on four students and a lab technician who worked at Cairne Wilson high school in Orleans, a suburb of Ottawa.

Some witnesses interviewed by police would be interviewed again because of details they gave to news media that were missing from their police statements, Doyle said.

Classmates quoted in newspaper and TV reports said the boy, who was not identified, was a loner and was teased about his thick, curly hair and acne. Doyle said none of the people interviewed by police so far had mentioned teasing.

Also, a 16-year-old who described himself as a friend of the suspect told The Ottawa Citizen newspaper that the youth had been counting the days to the anniversary of the Colorado shootings.

The suspect would say: "Seven days to Columbine, 11:21, six days till Columbine, 11:21," the newspaper quoted the boy as saying.

According to the newspaper, the witness made the comments about the countdown in a taped statement to police. But Doyle said he did the interview himself and nothing like that was said.

"That is certainly not what that particular witness said to police, not as they are stating it," Doyle said.

The stabbings took place during lunch break. The injuries were described as small puncture wounds, and the victims were released from the hospital later that day. The youth also had self-inflicted cuts to his hands and wrists.

He has been charged with one count of attempted murder, five counts of assault with a weapon, one count of mischief and possession of a dangerous weapon. He remained in custody until a Youth Court hearing Wednesday.

The Columbine shootings are believed to have inspired other school attacks. One came a week later when a student at a Taber, Alberta, high school shot to death one student and wounded another.

Several Canadian schools had received threats of violence as the Columbine anniversary approached. A 14-year-old boy in Regina, Saskatchewan, was charged Thursday with threatening to set off a bomb in a high school, while other schools reported low attendance on the day of the Columbine anniversary.

Appeal by man convicted of rape of 14-year-old denied

HUTCHINSON, Kan. — The state's highest court has overturned a lower court's ruling that would have freed a Hutchinson man convicted of raping a 14-year-old girl after giving her alcohol. Jason Chaney was convicted in the 1996 trial because the jury found the victim was incapable of giving consent because she was under the influence of alcohol. He was sentenced to 7 1/2 years in prison.

An appeals court overturned the conviction, saying there was not enough evidence to support that the victim was unable to give consent.

In March 1995, Chaney, then 18, took beer to a friend's house. The friend was baby-sitting with the victim, who drank two of the beers. She became drunk and went into a bedroom to go to sleep.

Chaney went into the bedroom and attacked her, authorities said.

Chaney's friend testified that the victim yelled no several times.

Court documents show the friend testified the victim was "very well intoxicated ... tripping all over the place, and her eyes were bloodshot red and she had slurred speech."

Appeals Court Judge Robert J. Lewis Jr wrote in last year's opinion that consent is a two-edged sword.

"On one side is consent and on the other is refusal to consent. If the victim can do one, he or she can do either," he wrote.

The Kansas Supreme Court disagreed.

"We do not conclude that a victim, no matter how drunk, disoriented and incoherent, somehow exhibits clarity of thinking by instinctively responding to unwanted advances. It is not outside the realm of reason to think that a victim can be too drunk to provide valid consent to sex yet remain capable, on some level, of rejecting unwanted aggression," the nine-page decision said.

One of the seven justices, Donald L. Allegrucci, dissented from the majority. Prosecutors feared the lower court's ruling indicated the definition of rape by intoxication applies only if the victim is passed out.

Chaney remains incarcerated in the Hutchinson Correctional Facility.

Tentative agreement made in 3-week LA janitor strike

LOS ANGELES — A tentative contract agreement has been reached to end a nearly three-week-old janitors' strike, though workers won't return to their jobs until the deal is ratified, a union official said.

The agreement was reached Saturday night, after about seven hours of negotiations.

A ratification vote was scheduled, set for today, three weeks to the day that 8,500 janitors walked off the job throughout Los Angeles County.

Officials for both sides refused to release details pending the vote, but pronounced themselves pleased with the proposal.

Mike Garcia, president of Service Employees International Union Local 1877, said he hopes the janitors approve the contract.

"It's a good deal, but we can't comment more than that," Garcia said.

Dick Davis, a chief negotiator for the cleaning companies, said unionized janitors could be back on the job as early as today if the contract is approved.

"I think it's a decent deal for both sides," Davis said.

Companies had been using replacement workers since April 3, when the janitors struck against 18 cleaning contractors who handle most of the city's commercial properties.

The agreement reached Saturday was with nine contractors that handle 97 percent of the affected buildings, Davis said. The other firms are small and are expected to agree to any deal struck, he said.

The janitors generally earn between $6.80 and $7.90, and were seeking wage increases of $1-an-hour per year for each of the next three years. Contractors had offered more modest raises.

Saturday's talks were the first held since last Wednesday, when negotiations broke off with both sides only a nickel apart on wages.

Davis said some property owners worked behind the scenes to encourage both sides to settle.

"I think a little give and take with both sides" led to agreement, he said. "It's been a tough strike for both sides."

Muslim Student Association sponsors 6th-annual open house

Promotion of multicultural understanding and the chance to share a place of worship was the purpose of the sixth annual open house Saturday at the Islamic Center of Manhattan.

The event, sponsored by the K-State Muslim Student Association, was a good way to let people in the community know about the Islamic faith and, as a result, gain a better understanding of other religions, said Tawfik Aboellail, president of the Islamic Center of Manhattan.

"Just for outreach to the larger community of Manhattan and to show them this is a place of worship," Aboellail said.

"This would be a chance to exchange cultures."

Guests were able to tour the Islamic Center's facilities, view its gallery of international art, see an audio-visual program and sample many different types of international foods prepared by the Muslim Women of Manhattan.

Aboellail said this year's open house brought in about the same number of guests as last year's.

"Last year we got about a hundred," Aboellail said. "The number is OK."

The open house formerly took place in a rent on the K-State campus, Aboellail said, with around a thousand people stopping by to check things out.

He said fewer people visit the open house now that it has moved to the Islamic Center, but the guests who do come tend to listen more closely to the information and get more out of it.

"Who sees is not like who listens,"

Aboellail said.

Some of the guests came because they had once visited or lived in the Middle East and wanted to remember the culture, he said.

"We look forward to it every year," said Lincoln Deihl, Manhattan resident and former K-State professor of management. "The main reason is we enjoyed many years there."

"We lived 20 years in the Middle East and Africa,"

Many of the guests came for the friendly atmosphere, good food and to learn more about the Islamic faith, Manhattan resident Sucheta Koshti said.

"This is very friendly, and there was good food and exposure to Muslim culture," she said.

Aboellail said people who were not able to make it to the open house are invited to stop by any time and check out the center, such as during its weekend Arabic language classes.

"I would like to invite people to come over to our place all the time to get an idea of what is going on at the center," Aboellail said.

Visitors to the Muslim Student Association open house Saturday were treated to several international dishes, including baklava, which is made with dough slices, nuts, butter and sugar.

Brazil's 500th anniversary marked by violence, protests by Indian, black rights groups

By MICHAEL ASTOR
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

PORTO SEGURO, Brazil — Celebrations marking Brazil's 500th anniversary were tempered by violence Saturday as police clashed with thousands of Indians and their supporters protesting what they called Portugal's invasion.

Police used clubs and tear gas to break up the protests, and there were unofficial reports that 15 Indians were injured. More than 140 people were detained and could be charged with disturbing public order, said Gustavo Rios, the local public security chief.

"We came to march in peace," said Nailton Patxao, a demonstration leader. "It is the government that is meeting us with violence. This is the true face of Brazil, 500 years later."

Huge traffic jams formed as thousands of police with metal detectors blocked access roads and searched people trying to reach the seaside resort of Porto Seguro, where Portuguese navigator Pedro Alvares Cabral first set foot on April 22, 1500. He is believed to be the first European to land in the South American country.

President Fernando Henrique Cardoso, who stayed on a nearby island overnight for security reasons, cut short his official program because of the protests. At a lunch with Portuguese President Jorge Sampaio, Cardoso tried to appease the protesters.

"In Brazil today, we have a sharp awareness of the social wounds that are part of our heritage of these 500 years," he said.

Sampaio also spoke at the lunch. "There is no longer room for resentments over the historical past, which had moments of greatness and misery, freedom and subjugation," he said. "We are all responsible for the time we were given to live. We inherited the past, and it is our duty to understand it, to transform the present and not reject it with belated guilt."

About 330,000 Indians survive today in Brazil, compared with as many as 5 million when Cabral landed.

Mounted police fired tear gas to break up about 2,000 Indians from all over Brazil who marched from the nearby Coroa Vermelha reservation to protest the anniversary. In feather headdresses and red-and-black body paint, many Indians carried spears and banners in Portuguese reading: "500 years of resistance" and "Who said Brazil was discovered?"

Several hundred protesters from black rights, student and labor groups tried to join the Indians but were gassed and pushed back by police. Some were clubbed.

"They won't allow any demonstration that disfigures the celebration," said Raimundo Bujao of the black rights group Quilombo Niger Okan. "This is Brazil for all the world to see."

Roberto Nunes of the federal district attorney's office said the police had shown "a clear violation of human rights. People have the right to protest."

About 35 miles west of Porto Seguro, thousands of landless workers camped by a roadside, saying they would not join the marches because of the police blockade and would protest there.

Cardoso was to attend a folkloric dance and greet a fleet of wooden ships, including replicas of Portuguese caravels that set sail from Portugal on March 9 to retrace Cabral's route. He also was scheduled to inaugurate the Discovery Museum near the reservation and attend an orchestra concert in the evening, but the foreign ministry said he probably would cancel because of the protests.

Across Brazil, many cities staged massive open-air concerts. In Salvador, the capital of Bahia state, tenor Luciano Pavarotti was to perform with local stars, while Brazilian pop star Roberto Carlos commanded the show in Brasilia.

In Portugal, flags from both countries were hoisted to mark the date but otherwise there were few celebrations marking Cabral's arrival in Brazil. Leading daily newspapers ran front-page photos of Brazilian Indians, and radio and television stations broadcast long features on the conflict.

Brazilian culture is important in Portugal, where soap operas, soccer players, musicians and food from the South American nation are wildly popular.

Recent fires should spark safety awareness

Annette Cessna lay sleeping in her Manhattan apartment as fire began to spread.

The fire was started when a candle she had left burning on a dresser ignited a tapestry on the wall.

Smoke spread through the house as the fire grew, but no alarms went off.

Luckily, Cessna, junior in pre-journalism and mass communications, escaped with her life. However, she was not able to salvage many of her belongings.

The smoke roused Cessna, and she ran to a neighbor to call 911. Most of her belongings were lost in the fire.

This was one of two fires last week caused by unattended candles.

While the dangers of a lit candle might seem minimal, they are quite real.

It is important to remember to take safety precautions to ensure something as small as a lit candle does not cause serious harm.

To begin with, periodically make sure smoke alarms work. This might seem obvious, but it is also quite important, especially as many students rent apartments and rely on landlords to provide alarms.

Always make sure candles are in a safe place, fires are put out completely and fire extinguishers are readily accessible.

If a fire does start, there are other things to bear in mind. One lesson Cessna's experience revealed was to close the door behind you when fleeing a fire. Her apartment had exterior damage because the door was left open.

In addition, an open door allows oxygen to rush into a house. As we've learned since first grade, oxygen is fuel for a fire.

Cessna was lucky to escape with her life.

It was through no fault of her own that she was in her apartment when it caught ablaze.

But her experience can help others to increase their level of safety.

Global-warming debate needs scientific input

Editor,
I must agree with Scott Roney that there is no evidence of anthropologic causes of global warming.

I just returned from a geological convention where a topic was global warming. During the past century, we know the Earth's surface has been warming, while the rest of the atmosphere is cooling. What we are not sure of are the human effects.

In a convincing presentation, Robert Balling, a climatologist from Arizona State University, and Alfred Pekarek, a geologist from St. Cloud State University, both showed the increasing carbon dioxide levels do not pattern the increase in global temperatures during the past 100 years. Rather, they showed the sun's cyclical energy variations pattern the increasing temperatures almost perfectly.

It doesn't take a genius to realize the sun is our primary source of energy and any fluctuations will affect Earth.

Additionally, the current changes are within the confines of normal. From paleoclimatic history, we find that global climate changes have been more extreme in even shorter time periods than the heating during the past 100 years.

Global warming still is debated in the scientific community. There is no consensus as certain politicians, the media and environmental groups would have the public believe.

I believe these people owe it to the public to bring back science into the climate-change debate and stop relying on hype and lies.

Medication not answer for most children, causes low self-esteem, harms families

The differences between my little sister and I are astonishing.

Only seven years younger than me, she exhibits behavior that never would have been tolerated by me when I was a child. Granted, she is 12 now and better, but for a couple of years she was out of control.

When I acted out as a child, I was disciplined by my mother and father and taught that what I did was wrong.

I was by no means abused, but when my mom swatted me or gave me the famous mom look, I knew that I was doing wrong, and I stopped it.

My sister, on the other hand, was not disciplined as much because she was too difficult to deal with. Hence the astonishing difference, mostly in attitude and behavior.

A few years ago, doctors thought she might have some sort of chemical imbalance and considered prescription medication to balance it. I admit that I jumped on the bandwagon because, frankly, I was sick of listening to her tantrums.

Looking back, I am thankful doctors never put her on medication because there was, and is, nothing wrong with her other than the fact she was a brat.

Today, society faces a problem with the overmedication of its children. Let's look at Ritalin, for example, since it always gets a lot of attention.

According to Dr. Peter Breggin, who has written several books on the use of psychiatric drugs, several million children in the United States are taking Ritalin to fix their Attention Deficit Disorder.

He also reports the United States uses 90 percent of the world's Ritalin supply. I simply cannot believe several million children need to be on psychiatric medication. Ritalin often is overprescribed to calm problem children.

ADD can be hard to discern in a child because the symptoms closely resemble those of children who simply are acting out. If children, for example, are taken from their parents and they start acting out in school, not paying attention in class or experiencing a drop in grades, they could have a drug such as Ritalin prescribed to calm them and help them focus.

Obviously, a child in a situation like that is possibly just acting out. What 7-year-olds wouldn't experience a drop in school performance after being traumatically taken from their parents?

However, all this having been said, Ritalin and other psychiatric drugs can benefit children. There are psychiatrists out there and parents and others who will argue until the day they die that no child should be medicated.

But I know of instances where medications have been an enormous help in people's lives. There are cases of children who are miserable for years and years and their parents don't know what to do or how to control the child. Then, after being diagnosed with ADD and getting a prescription for a psychiatric medication, their lives amazingly pan out. No, it is not infallible. A parent-child relationship still exists, and that always will cause friction.

The problem occurs when that normal friction is suppressed with medication. Children will be children. They will rebel, and they will act out. Some, like my sister, are just more rebellious and difficult to control than others.

Even several years ago, the number of children on Ritalin was dramatically less than several million. This shows that we, as Americans, are trying to cure a discipline problem with medication.

Children today are taking the fall and the blame for a problem that exists in adult America. Disorders such as ADD can stigmatize children for the rest of their lives.

According to Beggan, they can be denied entrance to the armed forces and future career choices can be limited. He also believes, and I agree, that if the drugs are prescribed irresponsibly to children who do not need them, it can cause damage to the child's self-perception and self-esteem.

We, as a society, should not try to drug up our children as a substitute to discipline because disciplining is too hard or too time consuming.

It harms the child and families. More importantly, it can harm a possibly wonderful relationship between children and their parents. A child acting out almost ruined the relationship between my sister and my parents.

Thankfully, the time was taken to find out what the true problem was, and for my sister, it was not chemical. It took patience and a couple of years, but isn't time worth it in order to keep perfectly healthy children that way?

Easter celebrations should remember death came prior to resurrection

It is quite strange that people would wear a cross around their neck.

When we see a cross, we naturally think of Jesus or Christianity, or perhaps peace, love or hope. But while a cross might represent all of these things to some degree, it is first and foremost an instrument of torture and death. Perhaps if Jesus had come in the 20th century, we would see people wearing necklaces with little electric chairs on them.

Sunday, about a billion people around the world celebrated one of the pivotal events of history — the resurrection of Jesus of Nazareth. But all too often we skip over the first part of the story. We forget that there is no resurrection without death. That death was in one of the worst ways imaginable — crucifixion.

Jesus' ordeal actually began the night before the crucifixion, praying in a garden atop the Mount of Olives. Knowing what lay ahead of him, he was under such extreme stress that he actually began to sweat blood. This is a known but rare medical condition called hematomatosis. Explains Alexander Metherell, M.D., Ph.D. (to whom I am indebted for much of the following information), "What happens is that severe anxiety causes the release of chemicals that break down the capillaries in the sweat glands. As a result, there's a small amount of bleeding into these glands, and the sweat comes out tinged with blood... What this did was set up the skin to be extremely fragile so that when Jesus was flogged by the Roman soldiers the next day, his skin would be very, very sensitive."

The flogging alone killed many condemned men before they even could reach the cross. It usually consisted of 39 lashes, though often even more were applied, using a whip of braided leather thongs with metal balls and pieces of sharp bone woven into it. The whipping extended all the way from the shoulders clear down to the back of the upper leg. As the flogging continued, the lacerations would tear into the underlying skeletal muscles and produce "quivering ribbons of bleeding flesh," as one physician described it. In addition to the extreme pain, the large volume of blood lost probably caused Jesus to go into hypovolemic shock, as evidenced by his inability to carry his own cross all the way to Golgotha and his terrible thirst.

Now came the cross — an instrument of torture so unbearable that a new word had to be invented to describe it. The word "excruciating" literally means "out of the cross." Jesus' arms first were nailed to the horizontal beam. To support his weight, the nails — more like railroad spikes — were driven right through the center of his wrist, crushing the median nerve in the process.

Dr. Metherell explains the effect this way: "Do you know the kind of pain you feel when you bang your elbow and hit your funny bone? That's actually another nerve, called the ulna nerve. Picture taking a pair of pliers and squeezing and crushing that nerve. That effect would be similar to what Jesus experienced."

When he was then hoisted upon the cross, another nail was driven through his foot, crushing the nerves there and causing a similar type of pain. Also, as a result of hanging on the cross, his arms would have been stretched about six inches in length and both shoulders dislocated.

Being in this position made it impossible to exhale. To breathe, he had to push up on his feet to ease the tension in his diaphragm. In doing so, the nail in the foot would tear further down until it came against the tarsal bone, and the person's bloodied back would scrape up and down against the wood. Eventually exhaustion would take over and breathing no longer would be possible. As breathing slowed, increasing levels of carbon dioxide became dissolved in the blood, causing first an irregular heartbeat and then cardiac arrest.

This, combined with hypovolemic shock, would have caused a clear fluid to collect within the pericardial membrane surrounding the heart and the pleural membrane around the lungs. This is reported in John 19:34, when one of the Roman soldiers thrust a spear into Jesus' side, "bringing a sudden flow of blood and water" and thus confirming that Jesus was dead.

HAI JENG/COLLEGIAN

He was buried in a tomb sealed with a huge boulder. His followers' hopes were dashed. It was over. They had thought he was the Messiah; now he was dead, and they fearfully were hiding out. Yet within a matter of weeks they boldly would testify to the world that they — and many others — had seen and spoken with the living, resurrected Jesus. Of the 12 original apostles, 11 died unnatural deaths for their unswerving testimony that they had seen Jesus risen from the dead. No one willingly would give his life for what he knew to be a lie. The historical testimony of the disciples' lives, of the dramatic conversion of Saul of Tarsus and of the very existence of a religious movement based upon a man who had been crucified points only to one conclusion: Jesus rose from the dead.

But this raises one huge question. Jesus demonstrated his power, authority and deity through his numerous miracles and his rising from the dead. He had the power to walk on water, to turn water into wine, to heal paralysis and leprosy and to conquer the one enemy that befalls even the greatest and strongest — death. Yet, he intentionally walked into the arms of his betrayer, he didn't resist arrest, he didn't defend himself at his trial, and he didn't use his supernatural power to stop his own flogging and execution. Why? What possibly could have motivated a person to endure this sort of punishment?

It was love.

Students share concerns on conservation, raise awareness at Environmental Fair

By SARAH SOURK
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Conservation practices among those working in the fields of food service and hospitality management were the main focus of Friday's Environmental Fair.

The fair, which took place in Justin Hall's Hoffman Lounge, was an event that allowed students of K-State's environmental issues in food service and hospitality management classes to share information and environmental concerns with their fellow students, said Pat Pesci, director of hotel, restaurant and institutional management and dietetics.

Ten groups of students participated in the event, covering 10 different environmental concerns in their fields through poster displays.

"It is a good thing that the students worked in groups and were able to work on their oral presentation skills, which relates to their future industry," Pesci said.

Although the environmental fair's main focus was educating others over environmental issues, it also was a contest.

The groups were judged on their poster or exhibit, the brochure or handout compiled by the group and the knowledge of the presenters.

The winners of the contest will be announced this Friday.

Jill Funk, senior in dietetics, was a member of the Recycling for Consumers group. Funk described her group's project as a three-sectioned informational fold for K-State, Manhattan and the Riley County area providing general recycling information.

The groups were responsible for their own research on the topics, Funk said, and the topic of recycling was an issue that appealed to all her group's members.

Her group gathered information from books, magazines and pamphlets, and through the Internet. The research not only helped with the completion of the project, but also gave the group members personal insight on recycling, Funk said.

Before the project, Funk said she had done some recycling with newspapers and aluminum cans, but her eyes now are open to the importance of recycling daily.

In its research, the group found that the state of Kansas is not recycling well compared to other states, Funk said.

"I think people aren't as aware of the importance. It is not a requirement in Kansas," she said.

Jaime Myers, senior in hotel and restaurant management and another member of the Recycling for Consumers group, said the group focused on the personal aspects of recycling, such as what is available, percentage of items recyclable and specific ideas for students.

Myers also found information stating that Kansas was behind in a recycling concern.

"Kansas does a lot of land-filling, not recycling," Myers said.

The fair became a learning experience, allowing participants to compile new ideas that will be helpful for next year, said Christina Albro, junior in hotel and restaurant management and member of the marketing team for the Environmental Fair.

Albro said these future plans include involving other classes and groups on campus, possibly branching out to other colleges and departments.

Advertising also is an area that Albro said needs improvement in order to get people involved with the activities of future fairs, with the class planning on continuing the Environmental Fair this fall and again next spring.

Pesci said that the environmental fair was a simple yet effective way of bringing certain issues to light.

"I thought that they did a good job of bringing awareness to the environmental issues concerning us," he said.

The Environmental Fair was a way to stress environmental issues that are important to the community, as well as a step toward educating K-State students, Funk said.

"I hope that they at least took one thing with them: a general awareness," she said.

Clinton, Giuliani sprint toward most expensive Senate race ever

By MARC HUMBERT
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

ALBANY, N.Y. — In a campaign that's been making history since Hillary Rodham Clinton announced her candidacy, the first lady and New York Mayor Rudolph Giuliani are on a pace to shatter the record for the most expensive U.S. Senate race in history.

California set the bar in 1994 when Diane Feinstein and Michael Huffington spent $43.3 million; New Yorkers Alfonse D'Amato and Charles Schumer spent $40.9 million in 1998.

Clinton and Giuliani have raked in more than $32 million so far, federal campaign-finance records show, and the election is still seven months away.

"We were saying early on, $50 million, but I think that's going to be low," said Larry Makinson, executive director of the nonpartisan, Washington-based Center for Responsive Politics that studies campaigns and their financing.

When soft-money spending by special interest groups and the two national parties is factored in, the total could easily top $100 million, said Peter Eisner, managing director of the Center for Public Integrity, another Washington-based watchdog.

Campaign-finance reports filed this past week show that through the first quarter of this year, Giuliani had raised $19.3 million and Clinton had raised $12.8 million.

About half their funds through the end of last year had come from outside New York: Giuliani counted itemized donations of $200 or more from every state but North Dakota, and Clinton had them from 46 states.

"This is a national race," Makinson declared. "This is going to be to the world of the Senate what George W. Bush was to the world of running for president."

In the 1994 California race, Republican Huffington spent $29.4 million in losing to incumbent Democrat Feinstein, who spent $13.9 million.

Four years later, the New York incumbent, Republican D'Amato, spent $24.2 million in losing to Schumer, the Democrat, who spent $16.7 million.

The reason for the big numbers in the New York Senate race is apparent, Makinson said.

"This is a double lightning rod race," he said. "Both of the candidates are capable of stirring strong emotions in people."

That has been particularly helpful to Giuliani, Makinson said.

"Obviously, the first lady has a broader household recognition," he said. "There's nobody in the country who doesn't know who she is and probably there's nobody in the country who doesn't have strong feelings either for or against her, and I think that's what Giuliani has tapped into."

In the first three months of this year, Giuliani spent more than $3.6 million on direct-mail fund-raising, including about $1 million for the services of conservative fund-raising guru Richard Viguerie.

That was aimed, according to Clinton, at raising money "from people who historically give money to Jerry Falwell or Ollie North or Jesse Helms."

The Giuliani camp dismisses that charge by saying Clinton still wants to blame all her troubles on the "vast, right-wing conspiracy" she said was responsible for her husband's impeachment woes.

Meanwhile, Giuliani has complained about Clinton's acceptance of campaign money from rap mogul Sean "Puffy" Combs, who is under indictment on gun and bribery charges in connection with a shooting at a New York nightclub late last year.

While the mayor's fund-raising success has surprised some, the Clinton camp publicly maintains it is not worried.

On Monday night, the first lady will join President Clinton and Vice President Al Gore at a Manhattan hotel for a fund-raising event aimed at helping her and Gore as well as other Democrats.

"There is no doubt we are going to raise everything that we need to compete and win," said Clinton campaign spokesman Howard Wolfson. "We're going to be right on target."

World-class athlete helps relay team capture 1st place

The Kansas Relays had one event that fans packed Memorial Stadium to see on Saturday.

The event: the 4x100 meter relay.

The attraction: Maurice Greene and his teammates.

Greene came back to Kansas on Saturday and was the main draw at the Kansas Relays in front of the second-largest crowd in the track meet's history.

Greene sprinted down the final stretch of the 4x100 meter and helped his team from HSI run away with the race. Afterwards, Greene thanked the members of the assembled crowd, some of whom he had spent the week meeting with and talking to.

"I want to thank you all for coming out and making this meet what it was today," Greene said. "It felt real good, and it's always good to come back home and put a show on for the fans."

Greene graduated from Schlagle High School in Kansas City, Kan., and track athletes from the school said they have been able to identify with one of the fastest men in the world.

"He gives us someone to look up to and has come back and spoke to us," Mike Clark, Schlagle student, said. "He talks about goals and doing things the right way."

The students said they enjoyed the rapport they have with Greene, and it is a relationship Greene said he enjoys as well. Greene said he likened to being in Europe, where track and field enjoys immense popularity. As for his work with the children, Greene said it is pretty simple.

"It is like I have been saying all along when I was a student — nobody ever came and talked to us," Greene said. "Me, as a person, I believe if I can help one child, I can help a thousand."

"It feels good to get to know them, and you get the hugs, and they come up and touch you."

Greene said that while he was the favorite in the race, anything can happen in a relay. However, he said he has two basic goals.

"This year it is really simple, and I have two goals: the U.S. Olympic Trials and the Olympics," Greene said. "Everything else

K-State track team competes at KU

The Kansas Relays last week showcased some of the area's top high school and collegiate athletes.

It was a positive day for the K-State track and field team which sent a variety of athletes to the meet. The Wildcats received strong performances from a variety of areas.

Several of the women's top performers were in Texas for a track meet, but those left behind competed for the Cats. Sophomore Aisha Green finished second in the hammer throw, losing to former K-State thrower Anna Whitham. Green said she was pleased to be able to perform and compete with Whitham.

"I took second, and I wanted first," Green said. "But it still was a 9-foot personal record. Still, it is fun because she is a three time All-American."

On the men's side, Tony Thompson said he had a productive day in the discus. He took seventh in the discus throw. K-State also had some of its former athletes perform well in the Relays. Gwen Wentland, a former high jumper at the school, won the event with a jump of 6 feet.

Jim Gruenbacher and Dustin Schmidt finished seventh and eighth respectively in the pole vault as each vaulted a career-best 15 feet, 7 inch mark. Tamel Sisney finished second in the shot put with a mark of 55 feet 8 1/2 inches, while the sprint medley relay team of Jason Green,

Budget influences choice of new sport

Future horse riders and competitors rejoiced over the opportunity to compete at the Division I level.

The bowlers, soccer players and softball players, along with those looking to participate in swimming and diving were left disappointed when the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics announced that equestrian would join the ranks of K-State sports.

"It is difficult not to add all of the different sports," Athletic Director Max Urlick said. "The decision may not be a personal preference and is not always personal."

Urlick said the reasons for not adding some of the sports revolved around a lack of facility and land space.

"Where would we find a place to play them?" Urlick said.

Urlick also said it is difficult to add the different sports when the school's athletic department budget is one of the lowest in the Big 12 Conference. He said the alumni foundation was excellent but just not as big as some of the other schools.

"We have a small alumni base, but it is growing with time," Urlick said.

He also said several of the future sports the department will look to add will depend on the future success of bigger programs such as football.

"Football is the wagon that pulls it all," Urlick said. "If we can get basketball going well, then that will generate additional revenue."

The following is a breakdown of the different proposed sports as they lined up through the different categories. The criteria that the sports were judged upon were based upon nine categories. The following were the criteria that the athletic department looked at in making its decision.

Swimming and diving

The size of the squad ranged from 25 to 35 participants, and the department said it would have a modest effect on Title IX. Another consideration was that its active club team had a variable range of participation.

Facility: The athletic department documents said the Natatorium is used by the University Swimming Club and it meets the minimum competition requirements. It also has a variety of people who use the club.

Operating costs range from $236,000 to more than $600,000.

Soccer

Squad size ranged from 24 to 30, and it had a modest effect. It was deemed the most popular of the new sports.

Facility: No facility or the space available to construct a Division I facility exists, which is a major obstacle. Memorial Stadium would not be available because of plans to renovate the stadium and the space is in high demand for use by a wide range of groups. Recreation fields are not available for intercollegiate athletics use for any varsity program. Frank Anneberg Sports Complex would be available for some games only. The field is used extensively by Winning streak snapped in Iowa

■ Iowa State Cyclones sweep baseball team, ending 7-game streak.

By JOSHUA KINDER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State baseball's seven-game winning streak came to an end this weekend at Ames, Iowa, when the Cyclones swept the Wildcats 3-0, 4-3 and 6-2 at Cap Timm Field.

The Wildcats (16-22, 3-16) extended their road losing streak to 16 games with the three losses. The losing skid dates back to May 5, 1999, when the Cats dropped one to Wichita State.

K-State became the Cyclones' first conference opponent sweep victim since 1994, when they swept Missouri.

In the first game of Saturday's doubleheader, the Cyclones broke open a scoreless affair in the bottom of the sixth when Iowa State outfielder Aaron Runk scored from second on a single by first baseman Jade O'Brien and an error by K-State junior first baseman Mark English to give the Cyclones a 1-0 lead.

Iowa State later would add two more runs in the seventh on RBI singles by shortstop Rob Conway and Runk to win the game 3-0.

However, English did manage to extend his team and career-high hit streak to 12 games with a 1-for-3 effort.

In game two, the Cats took an early 2-0 lead that would hold until the fourth inning, when Cyclone Ben Van Iderstine scored on a fielder's choice and an error by K-State junior third baseman Josh Cavender to make the score 2-1.

Then, with the game tied at two in the seventh, Conway crushed a two-run double to center field to take the lead, building toward the Cyclones' eventual 4-3 win.

Leading the way for the Cats at the plate in the second game was senior second baseman Chad Tabor, who went 5-for-5 with two runs scored.

The rubber game saw the Cats fall 6-2 on the superb pitching by Iowa State's Brian Curtin, who went eight innings, surrendering one run on six hits with five strikeouts.

K-State was down and out early in the game, trailing 2-1 after the first, a lead that wouldn't be chipped away at until the top of the ninth, when the Cats added one run on an RBI single by Tabor to score freshman outfielder Joey Ammirato.

The Cats' senior pitcher Jason Wells threw seven innings, giving up all six runs on 12 hits, while walking four.

K-State athletic department's decision to add equestrian highlights difficult decisions

Well, K-State fans, welcome to the world of equestrian.

It is a sport where the horse and rider combine to compete. It is the sport the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics added on Friday.

Other sports were close, but then again close only counts in horseshoes and hand grenades. Why would you add a sport such as women's equestrian? It is really all about the money. I think if you look at it from a business standpoint, it was the right decision.

K-State has added the sport and looks to be in compliance with Title IX within three years, but is this really what the legislation was about — horse riders?

NICK BRATKOVIC

Initially, the legislation was designed to give female athletes the same amount of funding and opportunities as other sports. It also was designed to give equal participation levels for males and females alike. But is this really what legislators had in mind?

In the late 1960s and early 1970s, was there really a starving cry for women's equestrian? No, in fact, the sport wasn't even recognized as a varsity sport by the NCAA until 1998. So I seriously doubt that the girls who were marching around on a soccer field watching the play intently really cared about equestrian, that the little girl who had 10 brothers who all had the opportunity to hit and field baseballs really cared about equestrian. No, she wanted the chance to play baseball or softball.

But really, that is what Title IX means today.

We have sports that have never generated much interest to begin with, getting started because they are cheap. I hear you can get a good horse by donation.

As one of the Intercollegiate Athletic Council members said, "I am sure there are a lot of alumni who would want to sponsor a horse."

Great, we are going to have a stable full of free horses. I am getting real excited about learning the ins and outs of the sport.

But it is also a sad day for women who continue to fight for equality in sports such as soccer, softball and the others. Those athletes played hard, and like anybody else in life, are just looking for that one break.

I guess equestrian's break came on Friday, and it should be looked at as a positive for the university, but more importantly, it was a good business decision.

Yes, that is what it came down to for the "Bramlage Brain Trust."

How could K-State become Title IX compliant and not hinder any of the other sports? If that is what those in charge were looking at and they had the Department of Animal Sciences and Industry looking to do a partnership of sorts, then it makes sense. It accomplished the goal and is a cheap sport to add.

The thing is, K-State Athletic Director Max Urlick takes a lot of heat these days. He is criticized any time a decision is made, and people are lining up to take verbal shots at him when things go wrong. Then, when things go right, Jon Wefald is there with one of his passionate,

"goodnight, amen" speeches that makes it seem he participated in the effort.

That is the way things work and is by no means unique to K-State. It is simply reality. When the Kansas City Chiefs finally win the Super Bowl, Lamar Hunt will get the trophy and not Carl Peterson. It's just the way things work.

Urlick will be the first to tell you that his department is run on generated revenue, and it has to do what economically is feasible and that it is forced to do more with less. It is just the way it is, and Urlick makes no excuses.

He has a difficult job of balancing the budget and keeping the fans happy. So when he saw that the addition of equestrian could be made relatively cheaply, and the program could get up to Title IX standards, how could the athletic department say no? If you look at it like that, it makes sense.

But hey, I am not Urlick, and I am not paid to balance a budget. I am simply a fan and am not excited about equestrian. Hey, I got sick of horses after watching reruns of "Mr. Ed."

So, I am not really excited about women's equestrian team, and while it paves the way for future sports, it seems so dull.

Who wants to spend spring days watching people jump around on horses while a fun-to-watch club team is playing soccer down the road at Memorial Stadium?

Businessmen, I guess. The rest of us can all take our amateur status and watch some club teams play.

is in between."

Still, with Olympic games and events not set to begin until September, Greene said he has a variety of concerns heading into those races.

"I am not excited about the Olympics yet," Greene said. "That is still a long ways off."

As for the race itself, Greene said it was a little bit of show, and a little bit of work. His teammate Otto Bolden said the same thing when asked which participant ran the best race.

"We are in Kansas," Bolden said jokingly. "So Maurice did."

KU RELAYS

Sean Redmond, Koli Hurst and Istvan Nagy finished third with a time of 3:26.80. Jason Reid threw 207-3 in the javelin to finish fourth, while Green ran a season-best 10.74 in the 100-meter preliminary on Friday.

The K-State women competed in Austin, Texas, and they finished sixth. The finish came behind the efforts of cross country runners Amy Mortimer and Korene Hinds at the first-ever USTCA National Team Championships.

Next action for K-State will be Iowa on Friday and Saturday for the Drake Relays in Des Moines, Iowa.

Drug testing recommended for WWF, WCWBy L. ANNE NEWELL
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

ALBANY, N.Y. — A New York lawmaker is recommending mandatory drug testing for professional wrestlers competing in his state, saying it's not a job at the simulated violence but a way to protect children trying to emulate their heroes.

"Almost all other major professional sports have adopted similar requirements for legal participation," Republican Sen. Thomas Libous said.

Drug testing as part of the state's licensing requirements would show fans the wrestlers are drug-free, plus it would improve the level of competition and protect the wrestlers' health, he said.

World Wrestling Federation officials say the plan hits below the belt. "We are performers, we are showmen. He'd be drug testing everyone on Broadway. He'd be drug testing the circus," said WWF Entertainment chairman Vince McMahon.

"If in fact he's trying to single us out, that is unconstitutional," McMahon said.

Wrestlers seeking licenses in New York already must give references, divulge any criminal history and submit to a pre-match physical.

Libous' proposal would take that a step further by adding the drug tests and punishment for wrestlers who fail them.

Wrestlers who tested positive for drugs one time would be prohibited from wrestling in the state for 24 hours under the proposal. A second positive test would strip them of the license for a year and fine their sponsors $25,000. A third would mean a permanent ban from New York competition and $100,000 fine for the sponsors.

Alan Sharp, a spokesman for the Atlanta-based World Championship Wrestling, said he could not comment on the proposal without having seen it.

But Sharp and McMahon said WCW and WWF wrestlers undergo pre-employment drug tests, and the WCW randomly tests its employees. The WWF said it reserves the right to test anyone who exhibits signs of drug use.

New York would not be the first state to mandate drug tests for pro wrestlers. Last July, Oregon Gov. John Kitzhaber led an effort to preserve that state's mandatory drug testing. The WWF is currently boycotting the state because of its wrestling licensing requirements.

Manhattan youth and is owned and operated by the city Recreation Department. Upgrades to accommodate the collegiate varsity soccer program would have substantial effect on the facility and its operations. Building a new facility would cost between $1.5 million for a bare-bones set-up to $4 million for a first-rate facility. Operating costs range from $272,000 to $608,000.

Softball

Squad size ranged from 18 to 24 team members.

Facility: There is no available university space that can be designated for a varsity softball complex. The current club uses Brummet Field at the Optimist Ball Park. Renovations to the field would run from $500,000 to $1.2 million. The parks and recreation department indicated a willingness to explore possible use of the Frank Anneberg Sports Complex. Operating costs would range from about $310,000 to $650,000 per year.

Equestrian

Squad size ranged 40 to 110 members. NCAA mandates a limit of 15 scholarships. The department acknowledges it is not a traditionally well-known sport, but it is one of the fastest growing NCAA emerging sports. There is now an active club participating.

Facility: The club team uses a variety of facilities for practice and training, including private local facilities. Cooperation with the Department of Animal Sciences and Industry assists the club activities. Operating costs range from $110,000 to $300,000.

Bowling

Squad size would have only a minimal effect on Title IX compliance, therefore more of an emphasis was placed on the remaining four options.

Campaign-finance reform fervor lost amid fund-raising windfalls

By JONATHAN D. SALANT
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Al Gore and George W. Bush raise millions of dollars, setting records along the way, even as they talk about campaign fund-raising abuses and a need for reforming the rules.

The bottom line: it's big-money politics as usual, a quarter-century after Watergate changes were supposed to clean things up.

"Everybody knows it's completely lurching out of control," said Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., who made changing the campaign finance rules the centerpiece of his presidential run that caught fire then flamed out.

Texas Gov. Bush, the presumptive Republican nominee, has raised more money than any other presidential candidate. Vice President Gore, the Democratic rival who faces continuing criticism of his fund-raising practices during the 1996 election, touts his own plan to change the way campaigns are financed. At the same time, the Republican and Democratic parties have set new highs for raising "soft money," the unregulated contributions from unions, corporations and individuals.

The chase for campaign cash never stops.

Today, President Clinton, Gore and Hillary Rodham Clinton, who's running for a U.S. Senate seat in New York, are scheduled to share the stage at a fund-raising gala in New York City, a week after Clinton and Gore appeared together at a Hollywood event. The two Democratic fund-raisers together were adding an estimated $4 million to party coffers.

And Wednesday, a Bush-headed black-tie gala in Washington for the Republican National Committee is expected to bring in at least $15 million — a record one-day haul.

Many believe the system that was supposed to have been cleaned up after Watergate has gone astray.

The tactics used to pump record amounts of money into political campaigns were unknown when President Ford signed a Watergate-inspired bill in 1974.

The new law added disclosure requirements, limited donors to giving candidates $1,000 each per election, and created the Federal Election Commission to enforce the rules.

Five years later, Congress voted to allow corporations and labor unions, though banned from contributing directly to federal campaigns, to make unlimited "soft money" contributions to the political parties. That started a trickle that has become a flood. The two main parties, which raised $86 million in soft money in 1991-92, boosted their intake by 160 percent, to $224 million, in 1997-98.

These "soft money" funds were at the heart of the 1996 campaign finance abuses, when foreign sources pumped millions of dollars into Democratic coffers. The money was refunded, and a Justice Department task force indicted 22 people. One of them, Gore friend and veteran fund-raiser Maria Hsia, recently was convicted of arranging more than $100,000 in illegal donations.

Bush has undercut another Watergate innovation: partial public financing for presidential candidates who agree to limit spending. Bush rejected the taxpayers' money and instead set new marks for campaign cash by raising more than $80 million through April 6.

Over the years, the courts have rejected efforts to regulate spending, citing First Amendment protections for free speech. Judges have thrown out restrictions on advertisements that don't use such phrases as "vote for" or "vote against," leading to a deluge of campaign commercials designed to influence elections without overtly saying so.

These court decisions allow groups and individuals to spend millions of dollars on ads going after candidates by name without disclosing who's paying for them.

A group known as Republicans for Clean Air spent $2.5 million on ads against McCain; the money came from Sam and Charles Wyle, two Texas brothers who have supported Bush for years.

"Voters have less knowledge of the financial interests supporting candidates, and we have a much greater threat of corruption because it's becoming more and more difficult to trace the millions of dollars flowing through the system, which all too often come from interests with business before the federal government," said Anthony Corrado, a professor of government at Colby College in Waterville, Maine.

Others said the system works fine.

"Money is the way you communicate to the public about issues," said James Bopp Jr., general counsel for the James Madison Center for Free Speech, who has successfully sued the FEC over its efforts to regulate campaign spending.

"When we have a situation in America where the general public is woefully ignorant about who the name of the congressman or senator who represents them is, the party they belong to and the issues that they stand for, we need more communication and more discussion of issues, not less."

'U-571' sets this year's standard in suspense

By KELLY FURNAS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

There's no mistake that "U-571" is intended to be a suspense thriller — there is little dialogue and huge emphasis on special effects and dramatic music.

And as a thriller, "U-571" is among the best in the category.

However, what puts "U-571" over the top is how intelligent it is when it tries to be more than a thriller.

The movie is also a first-class drama, with superb acting, dialogue, plot and character development.

Set during a fictional U.S. Naval mission from World War II, "U-571" tells the story of an American submarine crew sent to steal secret code information from the title Nazi submarine.

However, during the mission, another Nazi submarine destroys the Americans' ship, leaving the crew stranded on an enemy ship in enemy territory.

The movie is able to accomplish a lot of difficult blending. Not only is it able to be both dramatic and action-packed, but it also is able to incorporate extremely detailed naval lingo without being confusing to average viewers.

From an acting standpoint, the movie is a huge success.

This is Matthew McConaughey's finest performance to date, and the supporting cast equally is superb.

Few movies allow a character to be defined without words, but the viewer knows within the first minute McConaughey is on the screen exactly what his character is all about.

Harvey Keitel leads the list of co-stars, brilliantly portraying the ship's wise chief petty officer.

Also terrific in the film is Jake Weber, who plays a suave operations commander who has to learn the ropes of being aboard a submarine.

All in all, there is nothing wrong with this movie. It perfectly gauges when to build tension and when to relieve it.

Its special effects are hardly noticeable because they fit in so seamlessly with the rest of the film.

The sound is distributed well around the theater to give the viewer the feeling of actually being in the submarine. And the score is a masterpiece at setting moods of vulnerability, fear and triumph.

"U-571" undoubtedly will be chastised for creating a piece of fiction about historical events. However, some of the most successful historical movies draw a tangent away from the history books into a completely fictional story ("Titanic," "Saving Private Ryan"). "U-571" is no different.

This film deserves plenty of attention from viewers for what only can be called an achievement of action filmmaking.

Newman's performance spoiled by lame script, tell-all trailers

By KELLY FURNAS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

It's pretty much a lock that if you have Paul Newman in your movie, you're not going to have to worry about his performance — no matter how weak the script is.

In "Where the Money Is," Newman is spectacular. He plays a convicted bank robber put into a nursing home after apparently suffering from a stroke and becoming incapacitated.

A nurse (Linda Fiorentino) at the home, however, begins to suspect that Newman's character is only faking his illness.

While Newman is stupendous, Fiorentino is only adequate in her role. She tries to play a charismatic character with a rebellious nature, but the script never provides for enough incentive for her to make the radical choices she makes in the movie. She, in fact, plays her character with a reckless mixture of ditziness and brilliance. Her character doesn't really have any character.

Lots of other problems litter the movie, as well. The aforementioned script is weak not only in structure but also in dialogue. It's depressing to see talent such as Newman's not used to its potential.

It's also depressing to see a relatively fresh idea spoiled (warning: reading past this point might ruin some of the surprises in the film).

If you've seen any of the trailers for the film, you've seen the scene where Fiorentino's character pushes Newman's wheelchair-bound character into a river.

movie review "Where the Money Is"

Showing: Seth Childs
Cinema at 7:25 p.m.
Starring: Paul Newman and Linda Fiorentino

Whether Newman's character is incapacitated or simply faking it. This spoiler makes the first half of the movie — the best half — completely irrelevant.

But this is a problem seen way too often with Hollywood movies. Action movies show the best action sequences (which usually occur at the end of the movie) during their previews.

Comedies use all of their best jokes in their previews.

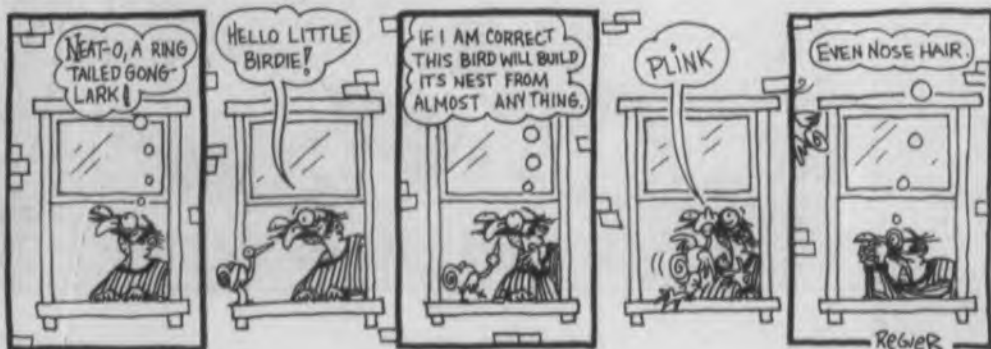

If Hollywood could have learned anything from last summer, it was that the best publicity a movie can get is word of mouth. Two of the largest money-makers, "The Sixth Sense" and "The Matrix," made their plots completely unclear during their previews, much to the delight of audiences.

If viewers are lucky enough to go into "Where the Money Is" without seeing the previews (or reading this far into my review), the movie could be interesting for quite a while, although it still lacks any original thought in the end.

If for no other reason, avoid "Where the Money Is" to show Hollywood where the money should be — in not spoiling films before audiences have an opportunity to see them.

presidential nominee, and Senate Majority Leader Trent Lott of Mississippi.

"There was no court order that gave them permission to raid the private home of American citizen," DeLay said, appearing on NBC's "Meet the Press." "This has been a bungled mess."

But a top Justice official said the only regret was that authorities waited as long as they did.

"We were forced into the action we took by the intransigence of that family," Eric Holder, deputy attorney general, said. "We probably should have taken a decisive action sooner."

Holder, also on NBC, said a previous court ruling upholding the government's general actions in the case, combined with an order from the Immigration and Naturalization Service, sufficed as legal grounds for moving in.

He acknowledged concern by the administration that Elian might be used by Cuban President Fidel Castro as a political trophy.

"That is Fidel Castro's history," Holder said. "He has shown that he has always tried to use whatever he can for his own political advantage."

Indeed, Castro called Saturday "a day of glory for our people" as some 400,000 Cubans, summoned to a rally, celebrated the father-and-son reunion.

Praising U.S. officials for their forceful action, the communist leader declared a truce in his enduring Cold War-era struggle with the United States, but added: "Tomorrow, the battle continues."

U.S. officials, expecting Elian will go back to Cuba when court appeals are through, hoped to influence Cuban officials on how the boy is treated in his homeland.

Elian, for once, was out of earshot of all the fuss. He joined his father, stepmother and baby half-brother Saturday in private quarters at Andrews Air Force Base, the home base of Air Force One.

"Finally they have some time together, some space together, some privacy together, some silence around them so that the circus atmosphere and that environment down in Miami (are) no longer inflicted upon this boy," Gregory Craig, lawyer for the father, said on NBC's "Meet the Press."

Elian was rescued at sea on Thanksgiving Day after a boat carrying him and other Cuban refugees sank. His mother drowned.

Miami relatives, flying to Washington soon after Elian was taken to his father, were rebuffed again Sunday in trying to get on to the base to see him.

"I will not leave until I see this boy," Marisley Gonzalez, the 21-year-old cousin who acted as Elian's surrogate mother, told a Washington news conference. "I know he's not OK."

With Juan Miguel Gonzalez holed up with his two sons and second wife at Andrews, the only accounts of Elian's state of mind since the reunion came from Craig and another supporter, Rev. Joan Brown Campbell.

She said on ABC's "This Week" that Elian acted like a "very happy, mischievous, normal little boy" when she visited on Saturday.

Craig released two photos after the reunion, showing Elian smiling in his father's embrace and playing with his baby brother. The Miami relatives contended the images were manipulated.

Immigration agents who accompanied Elian on the flight to Andrews reported that when they left him with his father at the base, he was "happily playing on the floor," said Maria Cardona, speaking for the INS.

Waiting as he was carried off in Miami, Elian was calm on the plane, napping on an immigration officer's lap, coloring and, at one point, crying a bit, she said.

learned that a ladybug lays 50-300 eggs in her lifetime.

Another table featured a sandbox with buried eggs where children learned that some animals bury their eggs to keep them warm. Children reached into the sandbox and pulled out warm eggs with prizes and candy inside.

Eggs filled with prizes and candy were a staple at all the booths and a concern of Eggstravaganza planners.

Leslie Herbel, senior in public relations and marketing intern at the zoo, said the eggs were one of her responsibilities prior to the event.

"I stuffed 3,000 eggs," she said.

Bauer said her first thought when she woke up Sunday morning was the eggs with prizes inside.

"I woke up and saw the rain, and thought, 'Oh my god, there are 3,000 eggs sitting out there in the rain,' she said.

"But today went really well, considering it started soggy this morning," she said.

Visitors to the zoo weren't the only ones at Sunset celebrating the Easter holiday. Bauer said the animals got to hunt eggs.

"We made papier-mache eggs and gave them to our tigers, chimps, meerkats and our grizzly bear and our sloth bear," Bauer said.

Herbel said the best part of the day for her was the kids visiting with Flopsy, a bunny at the zoo.

"Lots of little girls had the cutest little Easter dresses," she said. "I think watching them with Flopsy was neat."

"It was also kind of neat how we spent all this time planning and seeing it all come together."

rivalries, by rejecting attitudes of racism and xenophobia," the pope prayed.

Unlike past years, the pope did not single out any one country. John Paul asked God to "grant the human family of the third millennium a just and lasting peace."

Holy Week's many long public ceremonies were a grinding challenge for John Paul.

Hand and head tremors, associated with Parkinson's disease, and hip surgery six years ago make moving difficult.

He made his way across the square aboard a kind of chariot — a cart equipped with railings that the pope can hold on to as he is pushed by aides.

The vehicle is the latest Vatican strategy to conserve the strength of a man who resists slowing down.

The archbishop of Paris was quoted in a Paris newspaper on Sunday as saying that the pontiff is suffering from a progressive paralysis.

"We know that his illness is causing progressive paralysis of the body, but his mind remains intact. This man, who was an athlete, is becoming more and more a prisoner in his body," Cardinal Jean-Marie Lustiger was quoted as saying by Le Journal Du Dimanche.

The pope "retains a spiritual strength, an intellectual capacity and a memory, which are extraordinary for someone who will be 80 next month," Lustiger said, according to the newspaper.

Earth Day AGENDA

Politicians, celebrities discuss uses of clean energy

By LAWRENCE L. KNUTSON
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Politicians, celebrities and activists celebrated the 30th anniversary of Earth Day on the National Mall on Saturday and issued new calls to combat global warming at the source.

President Clinton, speaking on radio, blamed Congress for failing to recognize what he called the global warming threat and failing to act on legislation promoting clean and efficient energy.

Vice President Al Gore, the Democratic presidential contender, unveiled policy initiatives aimed at curtailing the flow of greenhouse gases in the atmosphere.

These heat-trapping gases, mainly carbon dioxide from burning fossil fuels, are believed by scientists to be contributing to a risky warming of the earth.

Gore proposed tougher requirements for power plants to reduce air pollution, while giving the industry the flexibility to meet the new goals.

He called for approaches such as emissions trading, which allows coal-burning plants that pollute more to buy credits from cleaner-burning plants until the dirtier plants can meet tougher pollution standards.

"We have to stand against apologists for pollution — those who believe in the old politics of environmental irresponsibility," Gore said.

David Hawkins of Natural Resources Defense Council praised Gore's proposal for targeting carbon dioxide and mercury, which are not controlled at power plants now, along with trying to reduce sulfur dioxide and nitrogen oxide emissions.

Hawkins said he is interested to see how Republican presidential candidate George W. Bush will respond.

Republican National Committee spokesman Chris Paulitz called Clinton's proposals "small ideas to help the environment" and criticized Gore's book "Earth in the Balance," which he said highlighted Gore's extremist ideas on the environment that would assure that gas prices would be raised 50 cents and that the economy would crumble.

The theme of Earth Day 2000 is "Clean Energy

Now," and the multimedia stage and nearby exhibit tents were outfitted with an array of high and low technologies which use non-polluting energy sources, including wind, solar, natural gas, biofuels and propane.

Power-generating propellers twirled in the chilly breeze and shiny government trucks presented a flashier image for electric or natural gas-powered vehicles.

Visitors ambled across the Washington Mall from the Capitol to the Washington Monument in a rock-festival atmosphere, complete with music from David Crosby and others.

Politics was on the mind of many speakers. Gaylord Nelson, the former Wisconsin senator widely given credit for starting Earth Day in 1970 encouraged participants to ask every presidential candidate for an annual state-of-the-environment speech to keep attention focused year-round.

"We've had 30 years of learning, experimenting, rehearsing for the future," he said. "If we don't (address environmental issues), we'll flounder around for another 30 years."

The loudest applause — and squeals — came for Leonardo DiCaprio, who acted as host for the afternoon of big-name entertainment and speeches.

"All Americans can be proud of the tremendous progress we've made since the first Earth Day 30 years ago," said President Clinton, setting the stage for the celebration in his weekly radio address. He said global warming was the most critical environmental challenge now facing the world.

"If we value our coastlines, or farm lands and our vital biodiversity, we must build a national consensus to reduce our emissions of greenhouse gases ...," he said.

Clinton said he will shortly issue executive orders to:

— Require that federal agencies reduce the amount of petroleum their cars, vans and trucks burn by 20 percent over five years. He said this can be done with existing technology, including the wider use of electric power, natural gas and ethanol as power sources.

— Subsidize all or some of the commuting costs of federal workers who use public transportation between home and work by up to $65 a month.

EVA-LOTTA JANSSON/KRT

Earth Day celebrants participate in the environmental awareness activities Saturday on the National Mall.

The president rapped Congress for allegedly denying global warming threat and blocking proposed remedies.

"While the science on climate change has grown stronger, and the need for American leadership has grown greater, some in Congress have buried their heads even deeper in the sand," the president said.

He said he was deeply disappointed that this year's Republican budget resolution "fails again to support America's environmental priorities."

"I call on Congress to reverse its opposition and work with us to pass my $4-billion package of tax credits for energy-efficient homes, cars and appliances; to invest in clean energy research; and to help us promote clean technology in developing countries," Clinton said.

He also called for an end to opposition to improving the fuel economy of cars and trucks.

Arkansas River downstream of Wichita unsafe for fishing, recreation

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WICHITA — The Arkansas River is so polluted, it is too dirty to touch, according to state officials.

But no one — city, state or federal officials — is sure why.

The river is fairly clean as it flows into Wichita, but by the time it leaves the city, the water is so dirty it is not safe for wading, fishing and touching, said Tom Stiles, chief of the office of planning and prevention at the Kansas Department of Health and Environment.

The river also is not safe for canoeing, kayaking or water skiing.

KDHE is under a court decree to clean up the river, but what the state will do and how much it will cost is unknown until the source of the pollution is found.

The state is likely to ask for assistance from the city, which is increasing its testing of the river with hopes of pinpointing where human or animal waste might be entering the Arkansas.

Finding the source of the pollution proves difficult because the pollution is not constant.

Possible reasons for the dirty water include failed septic tanks that serve individual homes and aging sewage pipes throughout the city.

Other possible sources are wildlife and dairy farms near Cowskin Creek and livestock operations along tributaries to the Little Arkansas River.

Also, storms can knock sewage treatment plants off line.

The Arkansas is not the only dirty river in the state.

About half the state's rivers are too dirty for wading or splashing in the water.

Nearly all the rivers in Kansas and a third of those in the nation are too dirty for boating, water skiing and swimming.

But the Arkansas River is one of only three in the state open to the public for recreation. The others are the Missouri and the Kansas rivers in northeast Kansas.

Under a court settlement reached in 1998, the Kansas Department of Health and Environment has to submit a plan to the EPA by June to clean up the Arkansas River basin. It has until 2004 to submit plans for the entire state.

The pollution problems come at a bad time for Wichita.

Hundreds of people had hoped to boat on the Arkansas during the annual River Festival, and the city is considering spending $20 million to make the river the centerpiece of downtown redevelopment.

The health risk on the Arkansas River on any given day is unknown because KDHE tests the water once every other month.

Also, the agency doesn't know where in Wichita the river gets dirty. KDHE tests show the river is fairly clean as it flows south through Maize, but is dirty by the time it reaches Derby. The agency does not test the water in between the cities.

Wichita does test the water, but it is not done daily. The only time that happens is during the River Festival.

Janet Wright, executive director of the festival, said she did not know of the state's concerns about the river.

Several events during the festival are on the river.

"They haven't notified us that there is any reason we should be concerned at this point," she said.

The city wants more proof that the pollution problem is coming from Wichita, said Chris Carrier, a storm water engineer for the city.

"If we are guilty, we are guilty. Let's clean it up," he said.

"But don't stick us with a responsibility that should not be ours."

Cooper arrested Sunday

By NANCY FOSTER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Jarrod Cooper, K-State free safety, was released Sunday evening from Riley County Jail after being involved in a motorcycle accident that led to his arrest after police discovered there was a warrant out for his arrest for failure to appear in court.

Lt. Joshua Kyle of the Riley County Police Department said Cooper was on a motorcycle headed westbound on Tiana Terrace when he struck a pick-up truck with a trailer that was backing into a driveway at 2624 Tiana Terrace. The truck stopped when it saw Cooper approaching and was struck by Cooper, causing significant damage to the motorcycle.

When police arrived, it was determined that there was a warrant out for Cooper's arrest for failure to appear in court. He was arrested at 6:41 p.m., but he was later released on $165 bond.

Cooper received abrasions and scratches from the accident, but he declined treatment.

Kent Brown, director of Sports Information, said he did not know of the arrest, but it would be handled internally between head football coach Bill Snyder and Cooper.

Program to focus on dropouts

■ Officials hoping to curb high rate among minorities.

By TAMARA MANN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The high dropout rate among students from under-represented groups is the focus of a program being developed at K-State.

The Developing Scholars Program possibly will be implemented next fall and is being designed by a task force and other concerned campus members. The program is designed to help students from minority backgrounds become involved in the academic life of the university in their freshman and sophomore years.

"At K-State, there is a very high dropout rate among under-represented groups. Our goal is to find ways to enhance graduation and retention," said Talat Rahman, physics professor and last year's Faculty Senate president. "This program will initially serve to maintain special students who may not be familiar with university life. It would engage students early and put them directly into working relations with a professor."

The program was first conceptualized under Rahman. It was devised to work as a pilot activity that will be a work and study program in which students will engage in scholarly activities with a faculty member selected from a pool of faculty volunteers, Rahman said. A Developing Scholars Seminar is being proposed in conjunction with the program.

"This will be worth the student putting energy into — they will be able to engage in something scholarly and create working relations with a professor," Rahman said. "This will allow students who are normally in big classes, that don't come into direct contact with their professors, to work with people in a possible field of interest directly."

Proposed projects could be assisting with a professor's lab, gathering research information or even working with senior students to see what occurs at that level. This program will work not only with students but also with their families. It will require students to monitor each other throughout the course while also keeping close contact with professors.

"We are basically asking students to make a strong commitment to the program. We will be working close with their families to gain support. At the end of the class they will have a mini-conference to present work they've completed to their families and others in the program," said

Man arrested in sting operation

By TANNER EHMKE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A 38-year-old Colorado man was arrested at 10 Thursday night in Manhattan City Park in a sting operation to lure sexual predators to police.

Daniel William Honzik, of Colorado Springs, Colo., was charged with attempted rape, attempted aggravated indecent liberties with a child and attempted aggravated indecent solicitation of a child. Assuming he has no prior convictions, Honzik faces a maximum of 99 months in prison.

Honzik's bond was set at $50,000, with a scheduled court appearance at 2:30 p.m. Monday at the Riley County District Court.

Honzik drove from Colorado to Manhattan to meet a fictitious 13-year-old girl he met over the Internet. Julie Posey, a Colorado resident who works to end solicitation of children via the Internet, worked in concert with the Riley County Police Department to secure Honzik's arrest.

Posey pretended to be a 13-year-old child in Internet discussions with Honzik and notified Manhattan authorities of the circumstances April 18, said Lt. Rodney Jager of the RCPD. Posey worked closely with the police until Honzik's arrest.

"His intent was sexual gratification," Jager said. "The evidence was present in the correspondence with the suspect."

A similar arrest was made March 6, 1998, when Posey worked in cooperation with the Sedgwick County Sheriff's Office to arrest Manhattan resident Gary Woellhof of attempted aggravated indecent liberties with a child and solicitation to commit aggravated indecent liberties with as child.

Posey responded to Woellhof's advertisement over the Internet seeking an orgy with a mother and a daughter. Through e-mail discussions, Posey posed as a fictitious mother with a 13-year-old daughter. Woellhof gave explicit detail of his sexual intentions with the daughter.

Woellhof arranged to visit the fictitious daughter at the Manhattan Town Center, arriving with a plastic bag of batteries and sexual devices. Woellhof was then taken into custody by authorities and assigned to two years of community corrections.

Although Posey is not affiliated with any police department, she searches the Internet from her home in Colorado for individuals targeting children. She then notifies local authorities if the activities or intentions appear illegal. CBS News, which was in Manhattan last week, is doing a biography on her work with Internet sexual predators.

Pentagon official to lecture

■ Myers 2nd K-Stater to present Landon speech.

By JENN DAVOREN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Those involved with K-State's Air Force ROTC department will not be the only ones with the chance to visit with Landon Lecturer Gen. Richard Myers during his visit this week.

Students of the College of Engineering, Myers' department during his years as a Wildcat prior to his 1965 graduation, also will be able to talk with the general after his lecture at 10:30 a.m. Wednesday in McCain Auditorium.

Myers, who serves as commander in chief of the North American Aerospace Defense Command and the U.S. Space Command, is soon to be assigned as vice chairman of the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff.

The Landon Lecture committee was quick to invite Myers to speak at K-State due to his expanding résumé and status as a K-State alumnus, said Chuck Reagan, associate to President Jon Wefald.

"We like to get Cabinet people, anchor people from the networks, people in positions of influence and whose responsibilities are at the very top of our government," Reagan said. "The chairman and vice chairman of the Joint Chiefs are the top military officers, and when we heard he was nominated and also a K-State graduate, we invited him to speak."

Reagan said Myers will be the second K-State alumnus to give a Landon Lecture, with former White House Press Secretary Marlin Fitzwater being the first alumni speaker.

Col. Stan Weir, commander of K-State's Air Force ROTC detachment and professor of aerospace studies, said Myers has visited the university in the past during trips to Manhattan to see family.

"He was brought in here several times to visit with the ROTC cadets," he said. "We dedicated a classroom to him."

Myers' activities upon his arrival to Manhattan will include a dinner tonight with the commanding general of Fort Riley and the adjutant general of Kansas, in addition to his visit with the College of Engineering.

"He'll give an excellent lecture," Reagan said. "I don't know the exact topic, but it will most likely focus on our military commitments around the world."

Weir said students involved with the military science program would not be the only ones to benefit from the lecture.

"He is a dynamic speaker, and definitely worth attending," he said. "He is in a position to really know and see what is going on worldwide and how the military is involved."

MYERS

The lecture is at 10:30 Wednesday in McCain auditorium. College of Engineering students can visit with Myers after the lecture.

Former Acacia members reflect on house's planned reopening

By JASON BECK
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Former members of Acacia fraternity, while pleased that their house will be allowed to return to campus, are realizing they probably won't have any active involvement in their fraternity's future here at K-State.

"The alumni got a lot of the problems solved," said Earl Zweifel, a three-year Acacia member and former house manager.

Zweifel, senior in architectural engineering, said he thinks the sanctions placed on Acacia by the Interfraternity Council did the job they were supposed to do.

"I think that people don't understand just how much the sanctions did," he said.

Zweifel said he, like many other members, will have graduated and moved on before Acacia returns to K-State's campus.

"Five years was a little excessive," Zweifel said. "The house could have never re-opened."

Acacia alumni said the Acacia fraternity returning to K-State will be a completely different entity from the one that was sanctioned.

"Some of the comments made seem to imply that we're continuing as before," said Bill Riley, a local Acacia alumnus who helped to coordinate the activities of Acacia's alumni task force and IFC.

"It's a complete separation," he said. "We're addressing the situation as if we were starting from the beginning."

Riley said plans for a fresh rush would not be implemented for at least a year, perhaps longer. He also said all former active members of Acacia were placed on alumni status and will have to petition IFC to return to the fraternity.

Gary Haag, president of the chapter's alumni, said they were not even looking at re-admitting any former members yet.

"Somewhere down the road, if a kid wants to re-involve himself, then we'll look at it," he said. "But the chances of that are 1 percent or less."

Haag said that if any former members sought re-admittance, they probably would have to petition the alumni as well as IFC.

Zweifel, Riley and Haag said they agreed with the actions of IFC in allowing Acacia to return, and alumni would be the key to revitalizing the fraternity.

"At the time the house broke up, we were working on getting the alumni more involved," Zweifel said. "This really brought it to the front."

Riley said the alumni had to realize some hard facts and get down to business.

"Our approach was to accept the fact that the house was not operating in a way we were proud of," he said.

The alumni did not question that there were problems, Riley said, and said alumni support is important for a successful chapter.

He said there are some new standards in alumni management, and there will be no relationship between what was and what will be.

"If a house can operate responsibly," he said, "it needs alumni supervision and support, or we can't maintain our standards."

Zweifel said he agreed that alumni support would be vital to the future of Acacia.

"With more alumni support, we can hopefully avoid some of these problems in the future," he said.

Former Acacia president Jason Archer declined to comment on the re-admittance of Acacia.

Microsoft says break-up not warranted in lawsuit

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Microsoft Corp. said Monday that none of its business practices justify such an extreme and radical remedy as a breakup of the company.

The Justice Department and 19 states that successfully sued Microsoft for antitrust violations are considering ways to break up the software giant, a source close to the talks said Monday.

However, any kind of divestiture is part of a full array of options being discussed, the source said.

Microsoft spokesman Jim Cullinan said nothing in the company's past behavior would merit such a remedy.

"There is nothing in the trial record or in this case that would justify such an extreme and radical remedy," he said Monday. "This would be bad for Microsoft, consumers and the entire industry."

News about the proposed remedy sent Microsoft shares plummeting Monday, sending ripples through Wall Street.

The stock was down 15 percent in trading on the Nasdaq Stock Market, and the Nasdaq composite index was down sharply.

The Justice Department and 19 states have until Friday to submit their proposed remedies against the company, which a federal judge ruled earlier this month in violation of antitrust law.

The Wall Street Journal, USA Today and The Washington Post all reported today that the Justice Department and the 19 states that sued Microsoft for antitrust violations now are seeking a breakup of the company.

USA Today and the Post said Microsoft would be forced to spin off its Windows operating system division from the rest of the company, while the Journal reported that prosecutors would ask that Microsoft divest its popular Office software.

A call for a company breakup would be the first such action taken by the Justice Department since a 1974 antitrust suit against AT&T Corp., which led to the breakup of the telephone giant.

Microsoft already has made clear that it will appeal the ruling against it, and the case is considered likely to be ultimately resolved by the Supreme Court.

USA Today said prosecutors believe that just restraining Microsoft's conduct — which was the focus of the failed settlement talks — might not be effective and could be more intrusive than a breakup.

Moscow exhibit to show supposed skull of Hitler

MOSCOW — An exhibition opening Wednesday to mark the end of World War II will feature what officials claim is a fragment of Adolf Hitler's skull that was kept in a secret archive for decades.

The fragment — with a bullet hole through it — will be displayed at the Federal Archives Service in an exhibition called "The Agony of the Third Reich: The Retribution" to mark the 55th anniversary of the end of the war.

The authenticity of the claim has been in question since Moscow first announced it had the fragment in 1993. A Hitler biographer Werner Maser said the fragment was fake.

The director of the exhibition hall, Aliya Borkovets, insisted Monday that no doubts remain about the authenticity of the skull fragments.

She did not elaborate. Officials said Monday they also had Hitler's jaw, but it was too fragile to put on display and just a photograph will be displayed at the exhibition.

Vladimir Kozlov, head of the Federal Archives Service, and officials from the Federal Security Service — the main successor to the KGB — did not say at a news conference Monday how the skull fragments came to be in Moscow.

The exhibition will include documents on Soviet work to identify the remains, the archives service said in a statement.

It also will display materials from a Soviet investigation into Hitler's suicide, some of his belongings and items from his bunker.

After Hitler shot himself in his Berlin bunker April 30, 1945, his body was taken outside by his staff, doused with gasoline and set ablaze along with the remains of his longtime companion, Eva Braun.

There have been unconfirmed, sometimes conflicting reports over the years about what happened to Hitler's remains.

Soviet troops, who captured the Berlin bunker, dug up the remains in 1945, and reburied them in Magdeburg, East Germany, according to Russian reports.

In 1970, then-KGB chief Yuri Andropov ordered the bones dug up to permanently destroy them through incineration, according to some reports.

Other reports suggest that some skull fragments were found separately in Hitler's bunker by the KGB and might have been brought to Moscow.

Five years ago, Russia put on display at a Moscow museum some of Hitler's uniforms, boots and other relics of Nazi Germany taken from the ruins of Berlin by a Soviet unit charged with collecting war trophies.

The exhibition sparked criticism at the time from some war veterans, who said it was improper to put Nazi memorabilia on display. Others worried it would inspire the small fascist groups that have surfaced in Russia since the demise of the Soviet Union.

Apparently seeking to reject such criticism, Borkovets said the exhibition is not dedicated to Adolf Hitler, after all, but to victory.

Brownback speaks. The Clinton administration botched the Elian Gonzalez case when it raided the home of the boy's Miami relatives, U.S. Sen. Sam Brownback said Monday.

"I think the administration has handled this wrong from the outset," Brownback said during a Statehouse news conference.

The Republican senator said he had heard that the government and Elian's relatives in Miami were close to resolving the matter when the 6-year-old was taken away in a raid early Saturday by federal agents.

"I understand that the negotiations were going on at that time," Brownback said.

President Clinton has said the relatives' refusal to compromise left Attorney General Janet Reno with no alternative but to order the raid.

The boy and his father, Juan Miguel Gonzalez, were reunited Saturday after being separated for nearly five months.

They have become entangled in an international custody battle since Elian arrived from Cuba in November. His mother died on their way to the United States.

Brownback objected to the use of tear gas and guns during the raid, as well as taking Elian during Easter.

He said the United States should offer citizenship to the boy and his father so that the matter can be resolved in family court.

The 11th Circuit Court of Appeals in Atlanta is scheduled to hear arguments May 11 on whether Elian can seek asylum without his father's permission and whether the U.S. Immigration and Naturalization Service should have interviewed the boy to determine his wishes.

K-State group works to create new multicultural curriculum

By DANEDRI THOMPSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State's provost said he's working on a project he's been excited about for a long time.

The project is the Tilford Group, and James Coffman, university provost, said it is working to create a multicultural curriculum model at K-State.

"I think the outcome will be a set of learning objectives and skills that we can make available not only to people in the colleges and faculty but also in student services and residence halls," Coffman said.

Coffman started the group in 1997 with the help of Juanita McGowan, director of American Ethnic Studies, after he returned from The Michael Tilford Conference on Diversity and Multiculturalism at Wichita State University.

Coffman said the goal of the group isn't to force changes on anything or anyone.

"Our deal is not to impose anything on anybody," he said. "We are going to do a lot to make the objectives available to those involved in curriculum. We're going to work very hard to make them accessible to everybody."

The Tilford Group is a research and development group consisting of professors and administrators that has been and will continue conducting focus groups of students and faculty in each college to develop multicultural curriculum goals for the entire student experience.

McGowan, chairwoman of the Tilford Group, said the group's focus on the total student experience rather than just classroom experience might set the Tilford Group apart from other groups researching curriculum guidelines.

The total student experience encompasses teaching and learning, curriculum, student life, advising and mentoring, she said. It's through each of those areas that the Tilford Group hopes to better prepare students to work and live in diverse world.

Coffman said the group wants to help students develop those skills because it is an area in which business people have said college graduates are lacking.

"We've heard it sporadically for a long time," he said. "And all kinds of businesses have ethnic diversity in both clientele and work force."

A first order of business for the group was to develop a nine-step process, McGowan said. One step included a retreat with business people and college deans to discuss diversity.

She said the group learned from the retreat.

"What they're missing, as far as employers see it, is for students to be able to work in multicultural groups or to communicate on multicultural levels," she said.

She said the group is in the middle of its nine-step process. The group is in the process of working with focus groups of faculty members in each college. By next fall, it hopes to be working with focus groups of students from each college as well.

"The idea is to see where the gaps are," she said. "Now we're just trying to gain input."

Coffman said he doesn't think the group will finish its work any time soon.

"Nine steps could take a long time," he said. "Once you get the mechanics laid out in the first three or four years, you still have a long time for all of this to come naturally."

tilford group multicultural curriculum

In developing multicultural curriculum, the Tilford Group will do the following:

1. Examine K-State's educational mission.
2. Identify business and industry diversity training programs.
3. Research multicultural competencies.
4. Visit business and industry sites.
5. Conduct Building Partnerships retreat with businesses, industries and college deans.

6. Conduct focus groups with faculty and students.
7. Develop curriculum objectives.
8. Improve college focus and faculty development.
9. Conduct assessment and evaluation of multicultural education.

Children injured in gunfire at zoo

By NANCY ZUCKERBROD
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — A feud between youths at the National Zoo ended in a hail of gunfire Monday evening, wounding six children at one of the capital's most popular tourist sites. A 12-year-old boy was in grave condition.

Capt. Brian Lee, a spokesman for the District of Columbia Fire and Emergency Medical Services, said one boy suffered grave wounds to the head. The other victims ranged in age from 11 to 16, and most were listed in critical or serious condition.

Hours later, police still were seeking a gunman, circling the zoo in helicopters and investigating whether shots were fired by more than one youth.

"We are looking into the possibility that it is gang-related, but we are not certain," Police Chief Charles Ramsey said.

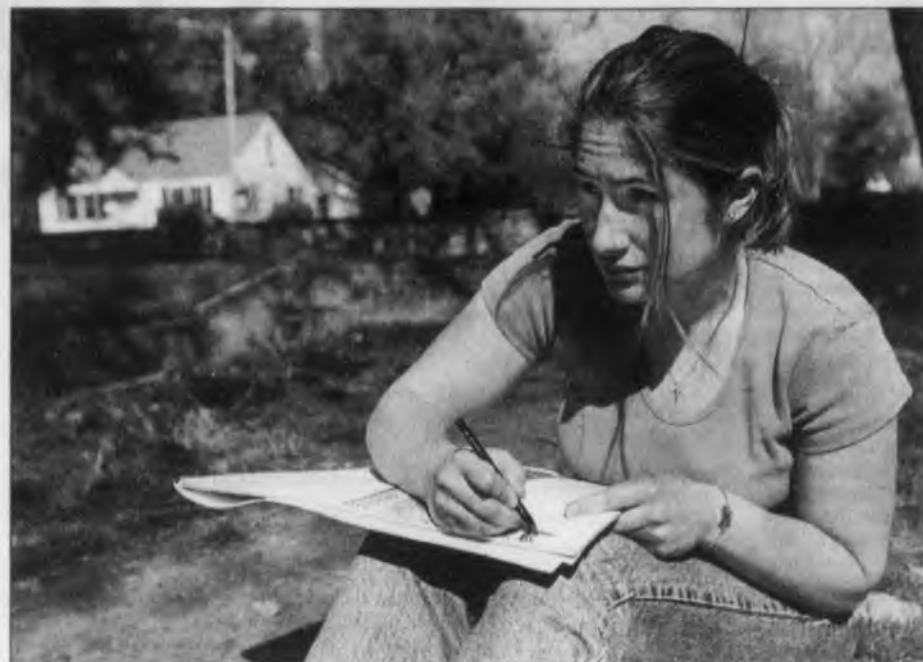

The zoo, a unit of the Smithsonian Institution, is one of the most visited sites in Washington, drawing 3 million local residents and visiting tourists each year.

Nestled inside one of northwest

Washington's wealthiest neighborhoods, it has seldom experienced violence and was better known for the rare Chinese pandas it housed for more than two decades.

At the time of the shooting shortly after 6 p.m. EDT, the zoo was playing host to a black family celebration day, a century-old tradition. The gunfire in broad daylight stunned visitors.

"I am not bringing them back. These are my grandkids. It is not safe," said Sandra Edwards, who was visiting the zoo with her grandchildren when she heard the shots and saw youths fighting.

Diversity to be discussed at forum

By TAMARA MANN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students will have a chance to discuss diversity at 4 p.m. Thursday and May 3 in the Hemisphere Room of Hale Library.

The first Diversity Dialogue forum will be concerned with gay issues, and the second will discuss feminism and women's issues. The forums are sponsored by the Multicultural Research Center in conjunction with Hale's yearly programming events.

Students from the Queer Straight Alliance also are helping to promote these events.

"Members of QSA will be the ones in charge of putting a panel together to lead the first dialogue discussions," said Molly Royse, coordinator of multicultural library services. "The discussions are done through a two-way dialogue, which is a great way for the students to get issues out onto the floor and discuss them. This is also an opportunity for students to learn about what other leadership organizations on campus are doing."

The Diversity Dialogue started a couple of years ago during Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week and since has become a regularly programmed event.

"The dialogue series originated to discuss diversity issues, and that's what we will stay focused toward," Royse said. "We are also trying to discuss things other than the normal diversity topics. We have hosted dialogues concerning religious diversity, women's issues and minority issues."

The American Ethnic Studies program has supported the dialogue series as a way to emphasize the importance of communication.

"The dialogue discussions are an excellent opportunity to discuss equity issues on campus. We encourage our students to take part in opportunities to discuss critical issues on campus," Juanita McGowan, American Ethnic Studies director, said. "The upcoming dialogues are more supportive of the issues and what they are about, but are still very important to campus diversity."

Organizers said they hope to include a dialogue on physical disabilities in the future. Royse said there are several people on campus who are concerned about issues dealing with physical disabilities, and providing a forum would give them a chance to talk about concerns.

The dialogue discussing feminism and women's issues still is in the process of being organized. Organizers are trying to solicit both students and various members of women's organizations on and off campus to participate in the event.

Event coordinators have scheduled the dialogues on different days of the month in hopes that their efforts will give a wider range of opportunity for people to fit at least one of the events into their schedule.

"Faculty at the university really help us out when they encourage students to attend the dialogues by offering extra-credit in their classes," Royse said. "This brings in an audience that might not have otherwise come, but might realize once they are there that it's something worthwhile."

Elían Gonzalez situation mishandled by all

No aspect of the Elían Gonzalez ordeal has been handled properly.

Regardless of whether you think the 6-year-old Cuban boy should be sent back to Cuba or allowed to remain here with relatives, you undoubtedly can identify problems with the way the situation was handled.

The poor management of the situation culminated Saturday morning in a raid of the home in which Gonzalez was staying. Immigration and Naturalization Services officers stormed the house to take the boy from his relatives and deliver him to his father.

The order to apprehend Gonzalez came from Attorney General Janet Reno and represents one of the many flaws — from all sides — of this situation. INS troops stormed the house without first attempting to recover the boy peacefully. In addition, the existence of a search warrant remains contested.

While the actions of the U.S. government were flawed, it certainly is not the only party that deserves criticism.

The boy's father, Juan Miguel

Gonzalez, has done nothing to make the situation better. He initially refused to make the journey to the United States, an action that only prolonged this boy's time in the American spotlight.

The family has done its part as well. When the boy's father arrived in the United States, the family took no actions to ease the tense situation. In fact, some members of the family threatened to resist attempts to take the boy, prompting the government's raid.

Fidel Castro and Cuba deserve some blame, too. Once the boy returns to Cuba, Castro plans to parade him around as a political trophy. This makes the U.S. government more hesitant to allow him to return home.

When all of this comes to an end months down the road, no one will be a clear winner. The biggest loser, however, will be young Elían.

He has been used as a pawn in a game of power politics.

A game in which no one knows the rules and everyone is looking for an opportunity to cheat.

I'm sitting here reading my student life handbook. That must mean I have a 10-page paper due.

If Elían Gonzalez was from Mexico, we would have dropped kicked him over the Rio Grande River 30 seconds after he got into the United States.

Is it a coincidence that Twin Oaks is missing their bleachers and Frank Myers is just being completed?

Equestrian is brand new to the NCAA and will not generate any revenue because no one will come to watch it. Then, there are softball and soccer, which have much larger interest on campus and will generate more revenue.

Men's wrestling is next, guys.

First K-State is busted by Title IX because they don't have the decency to even attempt to have equality for women in sports. Then K-State degrades us women even more by choosing a sport simply because it is cheap. I'm ashamed to attend this university.

Keep Elían Gonzalez. Send Janet Reno.

Or an ignorant communist.

Hey, Scott. One of the most pivotal moments in history was not the resurrection of Jesus of Nazareth. One of the most pivotal moments in your religion was the resurrection of Jesus of Nazareth. Get it right.

It's pretty stupid when the college gives out names to credit card companies so they can call you and interrupt your studying.

I would like to thank Title IX for giving us more worthless women's sports — like equestrian — instead of men's wrestling.

Yeah, Parking Services, it's going to take a lot more than two wheel locks to slow me down.

Is it me, or does the KSU hockey team not get enough press?

I wish they would have sent Max Urick to Cuba instead of that little boy.

Catholic finds column about religion offensive

Editor,

I found Jeff Elliott's offering on April 18 to be both boorish and a smear on the judgment of the Collegian's editorial board.

I do not make a habit of reading Elliott's columns. Raised as a Catholic and attending many years of parochial school, my desire to read weekly testimonials on his spiritual enlightenment has been tempered. However, Dianne Urban's letter in response to his latest installment piqued my interest, so I dug up a day-old copy.

I am appalled the newspaper would publish the self-righteous meanderings of this young man. It is not good journalism. I would suggest that both the editorial board and Elliott are not in the habit of reading columnists in major newspapers who provide opinion without degenerating into maudlin accounts of their personal journeys from "sex, drugs and being drunk" to salvation. If I wanted such literature, I would read the pamphlets left considerably at

Former Spice Girl's preachings on sexual responsibility needed to promote health, well-being

Just when I began to think the Spice Girls had receded to their land of leopard-print mountains and trees growing pink feather boas, I was put in my place.

Recently, former Spice Girl Geri Halliwell — a.k.a. Ginger Spice — sparked a controversy in the world of sexual reproduction.

This controversy is not due to her sex life, as one might think. It is because she has taken steps toward improving awareness of sexual reproductive health in young women. Like Audrey Hepburn and Sophia Loren, she has become a U.N. goodwill ambassador with sex as her subject.

Now, on to the controversy, because that is where the dirt comes out.

Speaking to young people from 52 countries at the U.N. youth summit in London, she was victim of a demonstration opposing her preachings. She was heckled by signs claiming she was a puppet on a string. She was interrupted throughout her speech. She was screamed at and made fun of, but she was unfazed by it all.

I suppose after living the life of a Spice Girl it would be difficult to communicate in a normal manner in public. Halliwell probably has heard more criticism in one day than most of us hear in a lifetime, so she has trained herself to be unfazed.

The problem is, she is trying to influence a generation of people who are having sex right and left and need to know about contraceptives. She is advocating the use of contraceptives — which angered churches right and left.

Teen pregnancy, unsafe sex and AIDS all are problems I would place into the drug-trafficking category of America's problems. This category contains problems that can be reduced but never fully solved.

Every year, 600,000 women die as a result of pregnancy. Halliwell compared this number to 22 double-decker buses — a common British mode of transportation — full of pregnant women crashing every day with no survivors.

In 20 years, there will be about 40 million children who will have lost their parents to AIDS. Forty million is the entire population of Spain. That sounds as if it should be placed into the catastrophic category of world problems.

How could parents be wary of their children hearing this sort of information? I do not understand how blocking children's ears — young women's in particular — is going to prepare any children for life beyond their natural home.

I do not think Halliwell was wrong for giving her frank and unrepentant speech to young people.

In fact, I think vital information such as that connected to sexual reproduction and contraceptives might be perceived in a more serious nature from someone such as Halliwell.

Statistics coming from someone who is a former sex siren herself (she has transformed her look and attitude into a woman of sincere intellect and beauty) probably are going to be heard more than any other way, except for maybe Hollywood movies. So what if she gave Prince Charles a pinch in the rear? I doubt that is the first one he ever had from someone other than his wife.

I think those protesters and demonstrators who were non-violent — but offensive at the same time — were out of line.

For children's sexual safety, more speakers such as Halliwell should be commended for their strides to make this world a healthy place in which to live.

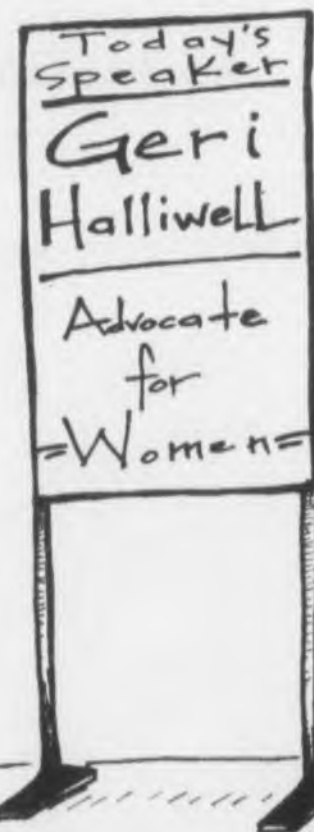

To condemn frank preachings is only going to uphold ignorance that we all know eventually leads to a destructive situation.

KELLIE FARRELL/COLLEGIAN

IFC's failure to enforce Acacia's sentence weakens system

VIEWPOINT

JEFF ELLIOTT

I hate hazing allegations.

I cringe when I read them in the Collegian because there is so much more to the story than what gets printed. Nine times out of 10, what we read about is far worse than what really happened.

I'm greek, and I know how easy it is for something minor to turn into front-page news.

All it takes is one phone call.

I've been on campus for four years, and I've seen it happen several times.

Your typical hazing allegation is nothing more than a disgruntled pledge crying sour grapes, and objectivity needs to be used when looking at the facts so that those investigating the situation aren't quick to jump on the hazing bandwagon.

News of a hazing incident usually holds little weight with me, but with Acacia, I regretfully make the exception.

Four hazing, three substance-abuse and two human-rights violations.

In the fraternity's defense, I wasn't there to witness what happened, and I don't know the specifics because they aren't available for public record.

This is of little significance because giving the fraternity the benefit of the doubt was a lost possibility long ago. The overwhelming number of violations of which it was found guilty speak for themselves. It was found guilty and punished — for five years.

Five years.

You don't just kick a group off of campus for five years without a good reason.

There have been several hazing allegations since I've been here. Most result in a slap on the wrist, and the members are required to educate fellow greeks with workshops and seminars on hazing, alcohol abuse and other tasty subjects.

If Acacia was just another run-of-the-mill violation, then why kick it off of campus?

If you know nothing about the greek system other than its fun parties with lots of beer at the beginning of school, you don't know the half of what goes on.

Greek houses, when they aren't catering to your party needs, are run like a business. They have to be, or all of you underage kiddies would have to find somewhere else to drink.

Members pay to live there. Their house bills pay for the mortgage, utilities, activities, food, cooks' salaries and all of the essentials that keep the place running. They even have to file tax returns.

On the outside, greek houses might seem like an endless haven of date parties and philanthropies, but internally, managing the house's finances and other affairs are a must if the organization is going to survive.

In order for the Interfraternity Council to kick Acacia off of campus for five years, the offense had to be serious enough to warrant the member complications and financial consequences that arise when you shut down a greek organization.

Now, after serving only a year of its expulsion, Acacia has been readmitted and will be back on campus by fall 2001.

Talk about setting an example for the rest of us to follow.

So, let me get this straight. If a house is guilty of four hazing allegations — they didn't have just one or two, but four — along with three substance-abuse and two human-rights violations, then it'll be back on campus within two years?

Are you kidding me?

I hate it when people bash the greek system, and I know a lot of people, especially within the greek community, will see me as a Benedict Arnold here, but let's face it — I'm used to people not liking what I have to say, and I'm not about to try to change that now.

So, here's the question: What does it take to make a sentence stick? Five hazing allegations? Six? Where do you draw the line?

The answer is, you draw the line now.

An example needs to be made of Acacia.

Otherwise, a pathetic precedent will be set, and it will become common knowledge that IFC can't stand its ground.

pay phones, public restrooms and distributed by devoted Christians outside the grocery store.

Certainly, Elliott feels a great deal of serenity after his renewal of faith. Even so, it does not belong among the pages of a college newspaper. It is unprofessional, inappropriate and, besides, while his writing style is without affect, it also is without a great deal of talent. There must be some student in the population who is hungry to speak out and can do so with a modicum of ability.

I would urge the board to restrict Elliott to addressing greater Christian issues, as that seems his forte, or request that he leave off contributing altogether.

I apologize if I have given offense, but I am sure I am not alone when I say I have been offended.

Take Back the Pride rally opposes sexual violence

Editor,

K-State is a great place to be. Small-town atmosphere, friendly faces that most of the time say hi as you pass and an eclectic offering of extracurricular activities. However, we still have to deal with issues that face campuses across the nation. Student fee debates aren't our only concern. Car thefts and murders happen here as well.

Rape and sexual assault are two of those issues the people of Manhattan and K-State have to face, even if they don't hear about them often. Statistics say that for every rape that is reported, 10 never are. Those same statistics say one in four of the women who are reading this have been, or will be, the victim of a sexual assault by the time they leave college. However, the greatest numbers of rapes don't happen in dark alleys. Nearly half of the victims of rape are in their bedclothes when the assault takes place. Acquaintance rape, or date rape, is the kind we rarely hear about. It is the one we could do the most to prevent.

The victimization of innocents ought to stop. I think about my mother, my sister-in-law, my aunt, my cousins — the women of my life — and I shudder. I shudder because I know it is someone who looks like my brother, father, cousins or friends who has victimized these women. Someone who looks like me, and God built like me. The victimizers of the innocent have almost always been men, like me. That makes me angry.

However, I know men to be something much more than rapists and violent warmongers. We can be as noble and gentle as anyone else. More than anything, I am ashamed. Ashamed to be a man, judged in the same category as those other men. However, I am not like those men. I want to make a difference. I want to stand up and visibly and vocally say, "I will not tolerate acts of sexual violence against anyone!"

Tonight, the members of the KSU Men Against Rape Society will gather with anyone else from this campus who wishes to make the same statement. We will gather with the men of this campus who will Take Back the Pride in their lives. We will gather with the men and also the women who support these men, because we need the support of all.

We hope you will join us on the corner of Manhattan Avenue and Claflin Road at 6 tonight and march across campus, making this message clear and unmistakable: "This campus is not one friendly to those who will perpetuate this crime. The men of this campus know the difference between right and wrong."

Equestrian right decision for women's varsity sport

Editor,

I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate K-State on adopting equestrian as the additional women's varsity sport.

In my opinion, the right decision was made. Although the competing sports did provide endless opportunities for those participants, the equestrian team offers something never before seen in college athletics: the addition of beginners. Equestrian accepts and encourages students who never have been on a horse, and those with limited experience, to become part of the team. Team members do not compete on their own horses, thus eliminating some individual expenses for beginners and new members. Any eligible student now has the opportunity to participate in a college sport and receive all of the included benefits, such as scholarship opportunities, national recognition and leadership roles.

Equestrian participants often are accused of not being true athletes. This simply is not the case. Equestrian athletes are just like football, basketball and baseball players. They train year round, and participate in weight lifting, running and riding for countless hours per week to avoid occasional injury and improve performance. They are serious competitors who often take years to perfect their skills. Many of these young women make it appear effortless, but do not be fooled by their talents. Equestrian is a grueling sport that often takes a toll on the competitors. For those who wish to criticize these athletes, I offer a simple solution. I encourage those who deny equestrian athletes are, in fact, athletes to come, ride and speak again.

The sport of equestrian also is occasionally under attack and questioned as to whether it truly is a sport.

Equestrian is a fiercely competitive sport. The competitors strive for constant improvement and gratification.

These women take their sport just as seriously as does the football, basketball and baseball teams.

The competitors are astride thousand-pound animals they never have seen nor ridden. Their mounts are drawn out of a hat and completely unpredictable.

It is up to the riders to demonstrate their abilities through the execution of a perfect pattern. In my opinion, that is the definition of a sport: the act of making a physical and mentally challenging task appear flawless and effortless.

In closing, I simply would like to emphasize my point.

Equestrian is a true sport, and the participants are true athletes. For those who are skeptical, I encourage you to saddle up and give it a try.

Taking driving privileges for 1st DUI lacks sense

Editor,

Looking every single day in the Collegian police reports, I see several unfortunate and possibly deserving individuals who have received DUIs in the days past.

I have no problem with the police department attempting to keep drunks off the roadways, but the legal punishments that follow are ridiculous. Carla Stovall proposed a mandatory one-year license revocation for first time DUI offenders and fifth offenses deserve a life-long ban from driving.

I fully understand the latter, but to take away someone's driving privileges for a petty first offense is absurd. Granted, driving is exactly that: a privilege.

However, no chances are available today for redemption of one's mistake. A few short years ago I remember having not to worry about a first DUI offense because a diversionary agreement could be arranged to wipe the blemish from a person's record — with the addition of a little extra cash, of course.

The main topic of defense for those caught driving while intoxicated is the questionable fact that they actually were just that — intoxicated.

The primary system for testing for polluted drivers is the Breathalyzer device. This machine is ridiculous and mangled with discrepancies, which can cause increased and inconsistent blood-alcohol readings.

There are several factors that can affect the spectrophotometry (brings back those ole days of biochemistry). The reflections and absorption of several additional similar chemicals can sway the reading in favor of the feared DUI. Such chemicals that can affect the reading are common in diabetics, people who are fasting and those on rigorous diets. These chemicals are commonly acetone, methanol, toluene and ketones.

Another problem with the Breathalyzer is it reads the amount of alcohol per unit of lung-air (grams of ethyl alcohol per 210 liters of breath). Moreover, the amount of alcohol in the bottom one-third of your lungs is much higher than the amount in the top two-thirds — this is how alcohol distributes itself naturally within the lungs.

So, simply translated: the harder you blow, the higher you go. This is like saying the longer you stand on a scale, the heavier you get. This logic is sheer stupidity. This machine is far too inaccurate to be used to ruin lives.

If a person is convicted of driving drunk, they should be proven to be so — drunk — before further convictions and legal actions are taken. The reliability of a simple kazoo for determining DUI offenders is a legal loophole that does nothing but cause detrimental effects to sober drivers.

Does anybody really listen to the words from a smart kazoo?

Judge determines Waco evidence shows no firearm muzzle flashes

By SHERRI CHUNN
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WACO, Texas — A preliminary review of infrared videotapes made during the final hours of the Branch Davidian siege found no firearm muzzle flashes from either federal agents or sect members, a judge said at a pretrial hearing Monday.

U.S. District Judge Walter Smith described the court experts' findings for attorneys for the plaintiffs and the government at the beginning of a pretrial hearing to determine whether key evidence gathered after the fiery raid was mishandled.

Davidian leader David Koresh and some 80 followers died during the April 19, 1993, fire that occurred several hours into an FBI tear-gassing operation intended to end the sect's 51-day standoff.

The government contends their deaths, whether from fire or gunshot wounds, came by their own hands.

The plaintiffs argue in their wrongful death lawsuit that government gunfire cut off the Davidians' only avenue of escape from the fire. They also contend the FBI's on-scene commanders did little to prepare for the possibility of fire despite

Attorney General Janet Reno's order that they be ready for all emergencies.

The judge told the lawyers that the review of the infrared videotape detected about 57 "thermal events," defined as flashes of light signifying heat. There were no muzzle blast either from Branch Davidians or government agents, Smith told attorneys.

He added that the only person detected on the tape was a Branch Davidian who was on a roof.

"You get good news. You get bad news. ... This is not going to result in a dismissal of the case," Michael Caddell, lead attorney for the Branch Davidians, said about the findings.

Caddell also said there was a suspicious pattern in the audio portion of the infrared videotape. Several portions of the tape are missing audio, and on one section of the tape someone is heard asking that the audio be turned off, the lawyer said.

Smith cautioned that he does not consider the report to be incontrovertible evidence.

Preliminary results from a recent court-ordered simulation of the siege showed that flashes caught on the original infrared videotape were most likely sunlight reflecting off debris, not government gunfire as plaintiffs claim. Experts expect to submit their analysis of that simulation to the court by May 8.

Smith also was expected to review the plaintiffs' complaint that the government withheld, destroyed or tampered with crucial evidence in their wrongful-death lawsuit.

The plaintiffs' attorneys filed a motion in March that accuses the government of:

— Never returning a roll of film confiscated from the Texas Rangers showing bodies and weapons found inside a concrete bunker. "The absence of these photographs makes it very difficult, if not impossible, to determine if any of these persons were shot outside of that room and moved into it prior to or after the fire," the motion said.

— Representing as originals audio recordings made from listening devices planted inside the compound during the siege. An analysis the plaintiffs commissioned suggests the tapes are copies. The tapes — which the government has relied on for proof that the Davidians spread fuel and started the fire — also bear signs of being recorded with multiple recorders, the plaintiffs' tape expert concluded.

Independent counsel presents subpoena to National Archives over missing e-mail

By DEB RIECHMANN
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Independent Counsel Robert Ray has issued a grand jury subpoena to the National Archives to determine whether White House officials tried to obstruct investigations ranging from Whitewater to Monica Lewinsky by not turning over e-mail, officials said.

The move injects Ray into the latest Clinton administration controversy when his office is trying to wrap up a six-year investigation and decide whether the president should be indicted when he leaves office.

Ray's office issued the subpoena April 18 to the archives, the government's official recordkeeper, which has advised the White House on archiving its electronic mail.

The independent counsel's office also is conducting interviews of witnesses in the e-mail controversy jointly with the Justice Department's campaign fund-raising task force, government officials told The Associated Press.

Both investigative agencies are trying to determine why the White House failed to review thousands of e-mails to see if they were responsive to subpoenas issued in various Clinton-administration investigations, the officials said.

The White House has blamed a computer glitch and says there was no effort to hide the e-mail from investigators. It acknowledges, however, that two top officials knew about the problem as early as 1998.

The archives says it will comply with Ray's subpoena.

"The National Archives received a grand jury subpoena from the independent counsel relating to record-keeping practices in the executive office of the president and intends to comply as required," archives spokeswoman Susan Cooper said.

Under the Presidential Records Act of 1978, the National Archives advises White House employees about managing presidential records but does not take full custody of such records until a president leaves office.

Government officials outside the prosecutor's office who are familiar with Ray's subpoena said it sought records that might shed light on which administration officials knew about the missing e-mail, when they knew it and whether any of them were relevant to investigations under Ray's jurisdiction such as Whitewater, the White House travel office firings and the Lewinsky case.

Neille Mallon Russell, a spokeswoman for Ray's office, declined comment on the subpoena. Ray succeeded former Independent Counsel Kenneth Starr last year.

White House officials say it may take months to review the problem and determine if e-mail can be retrieved for investigators.

"We continue to work hard to reconstruct and search the backup tapes and produce any relevant information," White House spokesman Jim Kennedy said today. "But I don't have immediate comment on that subpoena. We've been very clear about the fact that we are cooperating fully with Congress and others who have an interest in this case."

In addition to Ray, the Justice Department task force on fund-raising abuses and the House Government Reform Committee are investigating the missing e-mail. The task force and Ray's office are conducting some of the interviews jointly for efficiency's sake, officials said.

IRS cleared by Congress' report

By CURT ANDERSON
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Congressional investigators were unable to substantiate the allegations of IRS misconduct and abuse of taxpayers that helped spur reforms at the agency, according to a report made public Monday.

The findings by the congressional General Accounting Office are the latest in a string of investigations that failed to find the widespread evidence of problems in Internal Revenue Service criminal investigations and enforcement as alleged in highly publicized Senate Finance Committee hearings two years ago.

"Generally, we found no corroborating evidence that the criminal investigations described at the hearing were retaliatory against the specific taxpayer," the GAO report said. "We could not independently substantiate that IRS employees had vendettas against these taxpayers."

The GAO report also said it did not find any evidence to support claims made by IRS employees at the Senate hearings that their superiors ordered assessments against large taxpayers to be "zeroed out" in order to gain personal awards, improve their own statistics or pursue careers outside the agency.

"Our investigation established that the allegations themselves had been based on an incomplete awareness of the total circumstances," the GAO report said. "We found that each manager had acted within his or her discretion ... their decisions were approved by appropriate individuals and were documented in the files."

The GAO report was completed last May but was kept under wraps because it contained confidential taxpayer information protected by law. A version with some names and other data blacked out was released by the IRS under the Freedom of Information Act to Tax Notes, a journal that closely follows tax news for professionals. A version was also released to The Associated Press.

The Finance Committee hearings in April 1998 helped lead to the passage later that year of an IRS reform law intended to curb agency enforcement abuses and remake the agency into one that treats taxpayers more like customers. While the IRS now draws praise from Congress for its changes, the law also triggered a sharp drop in enforcement actions such as audits and liens.

Previous GAO audits have also found little evidence to back up the claims made by witnesses at the hearings. A blue-ribbon panel headed by former FBI and CIA director William Webster also concluded last April that the IRS Criminal Investigation Division was not guilty of systemic abuses.

In the latest probe, the GAO specifically found: no evidence supporting testimony from IRS employees Ginger Jarvis, Michael Ayala, Maureen O'Dwyer and Minh Thi Johnson that senior managers mistreated taxpayers, forgave taxes for big companies as favors or to improve their own status and allowed former IRS agents who now work for private companies to influence audits.

KAPE challenges legality of state's using minors in stings against alcohol retailers

By JOHN HANNA
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — A state employee's union is challenging a common state practice of using minors in sting operations cracking down on alcohol sales to underage drinkers.

The Kansas Association of Public Employees filed a petition Monday in Shawnee County District Court.

The group wants a judge to order the Division of Alcoholic Beverage Control to stop using minors in its controlled buys until state law is changed.

The group filed its petition on behalf of two ABC enforcement agents, Gene Hatfield and Wayne Weible.

In its petition, KAPE said agents are required to do set-up purchases using minors or face negative job evaluations.

The petition notes that Kansas law makes it illegal for liquor stores and taverns to sell alcoholic beverages to minors and for minors to purchase alcohol. The law contains no exception for the ABC's operations, the petition says.

KAPE attorney

Scott Stone said a crime bill that includes a provision to create such an exemption is pending with the Legislature.

Stone said agents raised the issue with him of whether using minors in such operations is legal. "These guys are cops, basically," he said. "They can read the law better than most."

The state is the only named defendant in the petition. Officials at the ABC and its parent agency,

ON THE WEB

the Department of Revenue, had not seen it.

The department's spokesman, Scott Holeman, said the practice of sending minors in to make purchases has been reviewed internally by managers and attorneys.

"We're confident there is adequate protection for employees and agents," he said.

Since July 1, the state has made 537 random attempts to purchase alcoholic beverages from either liquor stores or taverns, Holeman said.

Of those, 165, or 31 percent, sold alcoholic beverages to underage patrons sent in by the ABC.

Holeman said the agency hoped to make 790 random attempted purchases from July 1, 1999, through June 30.

He said the agency also targets taverns and liquor stores that have been found out of compliance with the law in follow-up visits.

3 construction workers killed in fall off bridge

By JAY HUGHES
The Associated Press

PEORIA, Ill. — Construction scaffolding tore away from a bridge Monday, killing three ironworkers and injuring two others in a 60-foot plunge into the Illinois River.

A sixth worker on a construction barge below the McClugage Bridge was treated for hypothermia after jumping into the cold water in an attempt to help his co-workers.

Jack Franklin, executive vice president of Midwest Foundation Corp., the company handling the construction, said the 80 workers on the project were devastated.

"All the people working out there are friends and know one another and have been working together for years," he said.

The accident occurred on the southern span of the twin-span bridge, which is undergoing a $26 million reconstruction.

The ironworkers were replacing rusted metal plates in the bridge's floor, Franklin said. The scaffolding, about 30 feet wide and 16 feet long, was suspended underneath the bridge. It fell into about 5 feet of murky, brown water.

One victim was pronounced dead at a hospital shortly after he was pulled from the river. Two others were trapped beneath the wrecked scaffolding, and their bodies could not be recovered from the silt bottom until the broken structure was removed by a crane mounted on a barge.

13 K-State students participate in testing for LAPD in Union

By NANCY FOSTER
Kansas State Collegian

Aimee Roebke, junior in criminology, said she was interested in joining the Los Angeles Police Department in order to help further her career.

"I want to pursue the FBI, and this would just be a good way to get started," she said.

Roebke, along with 12 others, attended a test session at 4 p.m. Monday in the K-State Student Union to complete the first of seven stages required to get hired by the LAPD.

Officers from the LAPD were stationed in the Union from 9 a.m. to 4 p.m. Monday in order to inform and recruit students for their police force.

People interested in the force had to complete a two portion test, a 50-question multiple-choice English test and an essay portion. For the essay portion, those interested pulled a topic, not related to law enforcement, out of a hat and had 30 minutes to write the essay.

Frank Banuelos, lead recruiter, said the test was required to test communication skills.

"A lot of police work is writing reports, so we need to make sure they have the skills to do that," he said. "Everything else we train them to do."

Those who complete the first stage will be contacted by a letter within two to three weeks after testing.

Banuelos said those accepted then chose when to complete the rest of the steps, which are all completed in one week in Los Angeles. A $2,000 relocation fee is granted to those who are hired to the force.

"We don't encourage people to drop out of school to do this, but we want to give them the opportunity to take the test," he said. "Then after they receive their degree, if this is something they decide to do, they'll have the first stage already completed."

Banuelos said they encourage students to finish obtaining a degree, and the force offers a 100-percent tuition reimbursement for those wanting to further pursue their education at a state school in California.

"We recognize the importance of having a good college education, so we want to encourage them to complete it," he said. "Then, when they join the LAPD, we can assist them in furthering it."

He said the LAPD is targeting the state of Kansas, and K-State is one of the reasons.

"We're here because we heard through research that K-State has a good social science background," he said. "Though we are looking for people with all different backgrounds, we have found people with social science backgrounds tend to do very well in our program."

He said they have 20 recruiters who travel twice a week recruiting students.

Doug Adams, senior in criminology, said he wanted to get involved with federal government work but hadn't considered the LAPD until their trip to K-State.

"I think this is a very good opportunity, and at the very least, you can find out if you can pass an English test."

Recruiters will return to K-State at 5 p.m. Friday in Union 213 to give additional students the opportunity to complete the initial testing.

Looking for an ADVENTURE

THE ADVENTURE OF A LIFETIME BEGINS WITH AIR FORCE ROTC

Are you a:
- Freshman
- Sophomore
- Junior/Senior with 2 academic years to go starting fall semester

Air Force ROTC is an elective - but it's far more than that. Air Force ROTC is also a program that teaches you to be a leader, develops your management skills, and helps you grow into a well-rounded and self-assured person. For those who qualify, Air Force ROTC can even help pay for college through its scholarship programs. When you graduate, you'll also become an Air Force officer doing exciting, meaningful things alongside other great people in fascinating places around the world. If you're interested, it's not too late to join. There's no obligation - as a matter of fact, you don't have to decide to join the military until your junior year. So go ahead, give it a try - you won't regret it.

Health QUESTION

By: Carol Kennedy

Director of health education and promotion at Lafene Health Center

Q: If someone gets athlete's foot, what should they do for treatment?

A: Athlete's foot is a fungal infection of the foot that can cause itching, cracking and small blisters between the toes. Diflucan (fluconazole) can be used to treat the infection.

If there is no response to treatment within 10-14 days, see your doctor.

Ways to prevent athlete's foot: keep the area dry by wiping off all moisture after swimming or bathing, expose your feet to the air when possible, wear clean socks (cotton or wool socks help absorb moisture) and avoid wearing shoes made of synthetic materials.

WOMEN & MEN FACE DIFFERENT HEALTH NEEDS

In addition to maintaining good health habits, women should visit doctors for pelvic exams

Men should give self-exams for testicular cancer, be aware of cardiovascular disease, STD risks

Traditional college-age women are, generally, a healthy group. To help continue good health long past the college years, students should develop good eating habits and exercise routines, know their family medical history, and receive yearly medical exams, said Reita Currie, health educator director at Lafene Health Center.

"Women should receive yearly Pap and pelvic exams to monitor their method of contraception by a physician. All medical conditions have side effects, and there can be complications," Currie said.

Currie said she recommends any woman who is sexually active or at least 18 years old have a pelvic exam. A pelvic exam should include a Pap smear, breast exam and checks for sexually transmitted disease.

"It's also important to have a chronological family history of diseases so we know what they are more at-risk for," Currie said. "We tell parents to inform their student of their family history and even make a copy of it for them. If they are ever in an accident, the hospital they're taken to might not have their chart or know what they're allergic to."

Dr. Earl J. Reppert, medical director and physician at Lafene, said men and women both should be aware of past sexual histories of their partners.

"Sexually active students of both sexes should receive STD checks prior to any partner change or if any symptoms develop," Reppert said.

"Remember, most men and women will not have symptoms of STDs."

Although cholesterol might not be high on a college student's list of worries, it is important to have a cholesterol screen if family history indicates it might be a problem, Reppert said.

"Many health experts would suggest that college students should get a cholesterol screen," he said. "Not all experts agree. Certainly this should be done if there is a family history of early heart disease."

It is also helpful to obtain a copy of immunizations received after high school. The school nurse should keep those on file for a while after graduation, Currie said.

Currie said a woman's basic diet should also include more calcium and iron to prevent osteoporosis, in addition to eating in moderation and avoiding fats.

Chronic health problems can be prevented by good health habits in college students, Reppert said.

"Avoidance of tobacco will markedly decrease the risk of various cancers — cervical, lung, kidney, throat — and will also reduce the risk of chronic lung diseases such as chronic bronchitis and emphysema," Reppert said.

Men need to make a special effort now to reduce their risk of cardiovascular disease, cancer and sexually transmitted diseases.

"Testicular self-exams are suggested for men on a monthly basis as testicular cancer is the most common cancer of young men," said Dr. Earl Reppert, medical director and physician at Lafene Health Center.

Sexually active students of both sexes should receive STD checks prior to any partner change or if any symptoms develop. Most men and women will not have symptoms of STDs, Reppert said.

To lower chances of STDs, the main method recommended by Lafene is to use condoms or abstain from sex, said Reita Currie, health educator at Lafene.

"It's also important to be aware of any changes and talk to someone about it," Currie said.

Health is not the only concern for students, Reppert said.

"The most common cause of death in college students is the same for both men and women — accidents and most commonly auto accidents," he said.

"Motorcycle and bicycles accidents are also a problem. So the most important safety issues are drive defensively, use your seat belts at all times, wear a helmet if you cycle, and don't drink and drive."

Eating a diet that contains the equivalent of three or four glasses of milk per day will promote strong bones and will reduce the risk of osteoporosis with aging. A diet containing the recommended five to seven servings of fruits and vegetables can decrease the risk of cancer, stroke and heart disease.

Also, avoiding a diet high in fats can reduce the risk of heart disease and cancer.

"Exercise is beneficial for cardiovascular health and strong bones. Excess pop decreases bone density as well as provides empty calories," Reppert said. "The most important thing to remember is eat a well-balanced diet and get a reasonable amount of exercise."

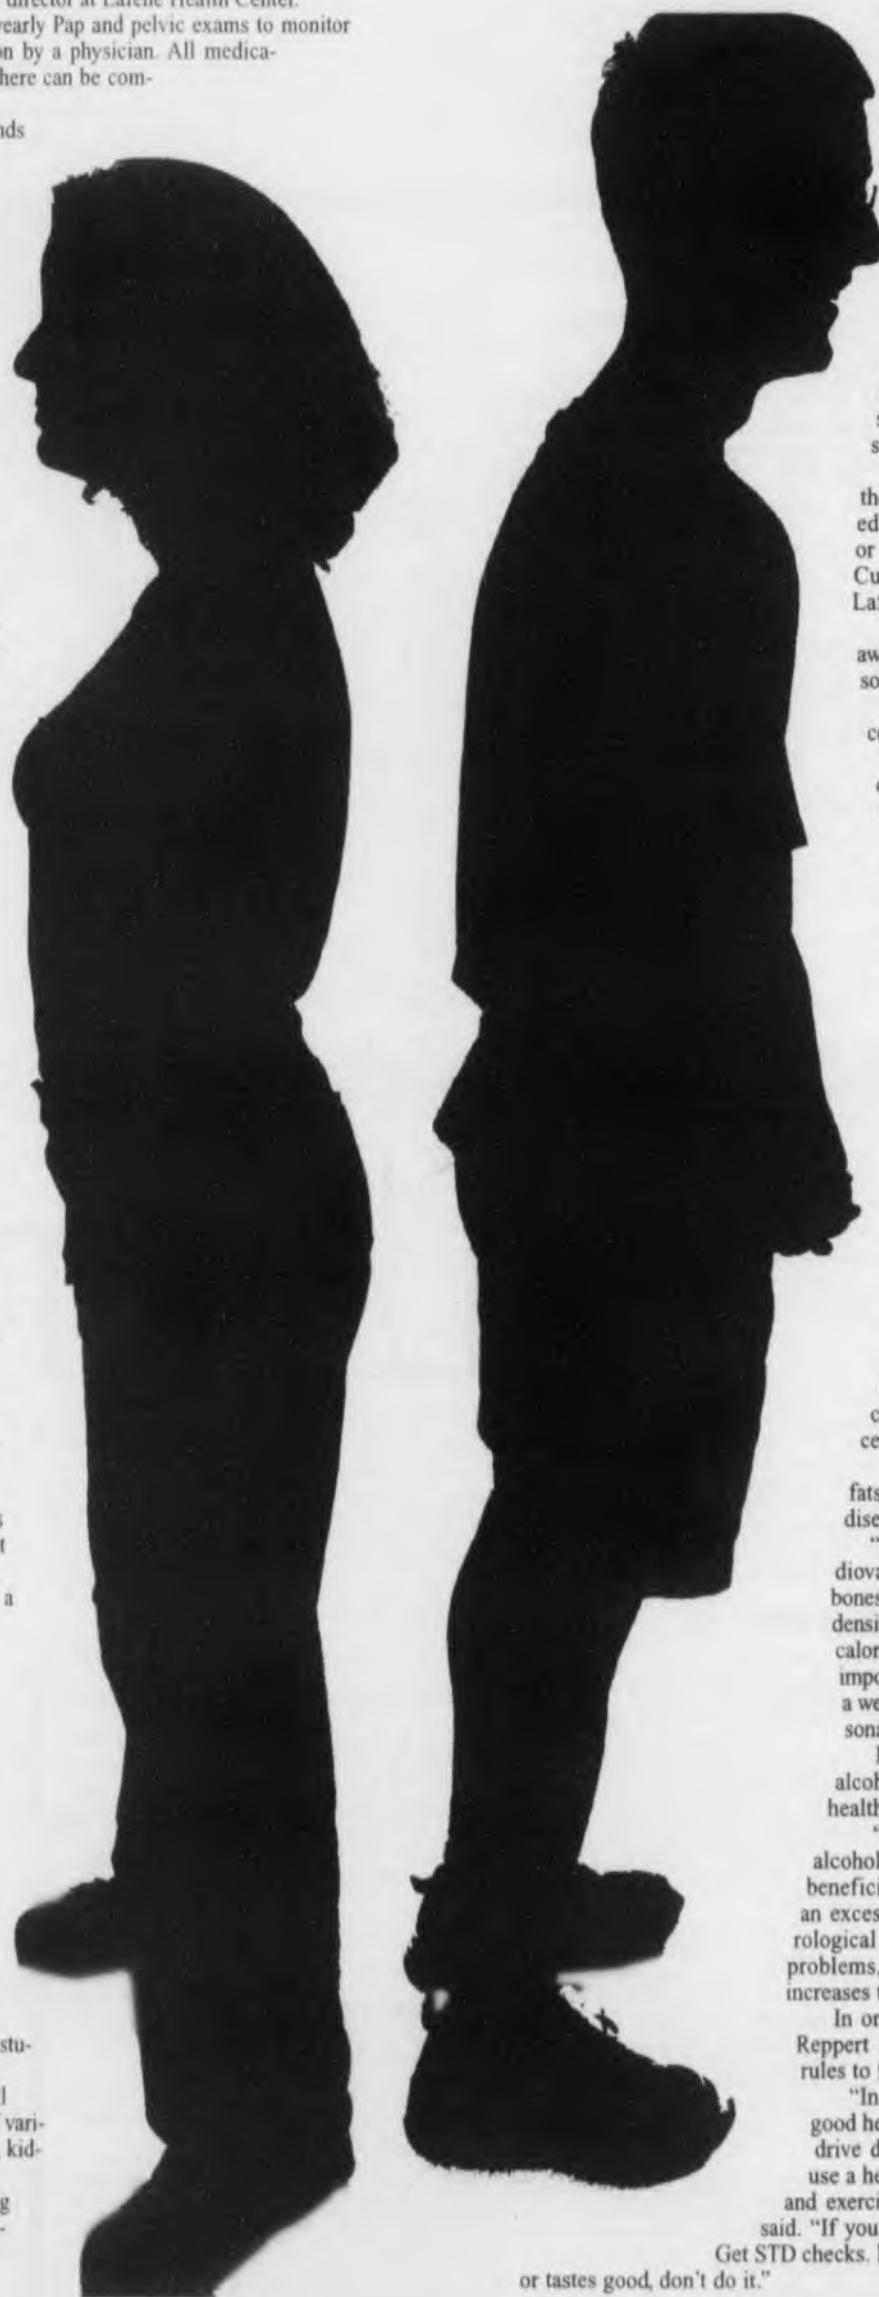

Reppert said the influence of alcohol may increase the risk of health problems.

"While a limited amount of alcohol may be harmless or even beneficial, one to two drinks per day an excess, causes liver disease, neurological damage and other health problems," he said. "Alcohol also increases the risk of injury or death."

In order for men to stay healthy, Reppert said there are a number of rules to follow.

"In summary, to maintain your good health follow these guidelines: drive defensively, wear a seat belt, use a helmet when cycling, eat right and exercise, avoid tobacco," Reppert said. "If you drink, drink in moderation. Get STD checks. If it looks good, sounds good or tastes good, don't do it."

Judge determines Waco evidence shows no firearm muzzle flashes

By SHERRI CHUNN
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WACO, Texas — A preliminary review of infrared videotapes made during the final hours of the Branch Davidian siege found no firearm muzzle flashes from either federal agents or sect members, a judge said at pretrial hearing Monday.

U.S. District Judge Walter Smith described the court experts' findings for attorneys for the plaintiffs and the government at the beginning of a pre-trial hearing to determine whether key evidence gathered after the fiery raid was mishandled.

Davidian leader David Koresh and some 80 followers died during the April 19, 1993, fire that occurred several hours into an FBI tear-gassing operation intended to end the sect's 51-day standoff.

The government contends their deaths, whether from fire or gunshot wounds, came by their own hands.

The plaintiffs argue in their wrongful death lawsuit that government gunfire cut off the Davidians' only avenue of escape from the fire. They also contend the FBI's on-scene commanders did little to prepare for the possibility of fire despite

Attorney General Janet Reno's order that they be ready for all emergencies.

The judge told the lawyers that the review of the infrared videotape detected about 57 "thermal events," defined as flashes of light signifying heat. There were no muzzle blasts either from Branch Davidians or government agents, Smith told attorneys.

He added that the only person detected on the tape was a Branch Davidian who was on a roof.

"You get good news. You get bad news. ... This is not going to result in a dismissal of the case," Michael Caddell, lead attorney for the Branch Davidians, said about the findings.

Caddell also said there was a suspicious pattern in the audio portion of the infrared videotape. Several portions of the tape are missing audio, and on one section of the tape someone is heard asking that the audio be turned off, the lawyer said.

Smith cautioned that he does not consider the report to be incontrovertible evidence.

Preliminary results from a recent court-ordered simulation of the siege showed that flashes caught on the original infrared videotape were most likely sunlight reflecting off debris, not government gunfire as plaintiffs claim. Experts expect to submit their analysis of that simulation to the court by May 8.

Smith also was expected to review the plaintiffs' complaint that the government withheld, destroyed or tampered with crucial evidence in their wrongful-death lawsuit.

The plaintiffs' attorneys filed a motion in March that accuses the government of:

— Never returning a roll of film confiscated from the Texas Rangers showing bodies and weapons found inside a concrete bunker. "The absence of these photographs makes it very difficult, if not impossible, to determine if any of these persons were shot outside of that room and moved into it prior to or after the fire," the motion said.

— Representing as originals audio recordings made from listening devices planted inside the compound during the siege. An analysis the plaintiffs commissioned suggests the tapes are copies. The tapes — which the government has relied on for proof that the Davidians spread fuel and started the fire — also bear signs of being recorded with multiple recorders, the plaintiffs' tape expert concluded.

Independent counsel presents subpoena to National Archives over missing e-mail

By DEB RIECHMANN
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Independent Counsel Robert Ray has issued a grand jury subpoena to the National Archives to determine whether White House officials tried to obstruct investigations ranging from Whitewater to Monica Lewinsky by not turning over e-mail, officials said.

The move injects Ray into the latest Clinton administration controversy when his office is trying to wrap up a six-year investigation and decide whether the president should be indicted when he leaves office.

Ray's office issued the subpoena April 18 to the archives, the government's official recordkeeper, which has advised the White House on archiving its electronic mail.

The independent counsel's office also is conducting interviews of witnesses in the e-mail controversy jointly with the Justice Department's campaign fund-raising task force, government officials told The Associated Press.

Both investigative agencies are trying to determine why the White House failed to review thousands of e-mails to see if they were responsive to subpoenas issued in various Clinton-administration investigations, the officials said.

The White House has blamed a computer glitch and says there was no effort to hide the e-mail from investigators. It acknowledges, however, that two top officials knew about the problem as early as 1998.

The archives says it will comply with Ray's subpoena.

"The National Archives received a grand jury subpoena from the independent counsel relating to record-keeping practices in the executive office of the president and intends to comply as required," archives spokeswoman Susan Cooper said.

Under the Presidential Records Act of 1978, the National Archives advises White House employees about managing presidential records but does not take full custody of such records until a president leaves office.

Government officials outside the prosecutor's office who are familiar with Ray's subpoena said it sought records that might shed light on which administration officials knew about the missing e-mail, when they knew it and whether any of them were relevant to investigations under Ray's jurisdiction such as Whitewater, the White House travel office firings and the Lewinsky case.

Neille Mallon Russell, a spokeswoman for Ray's office, declined comment on the subpoena. Ray succeeded former Independent Counsel Kenneth Starr last year.

White House officials say it may take months to review the problem and determine if e-mail can be retrieved for investigators.

"We continue to work hard to reconstruct and search the backup tapes and produce any relevant information," White House spokesman Jim Kennedy said today. "But I don't have immediate comment on that subpoena. We've been very clear about the fact that we are cooperating fully with Congress and others who have an interest in this case."

In addition to Ray, the Justice Department task force on fund-raising abuses and the House Government Reform Committee are investigating the missing e-mail. The task force and Ray's office are conducting some of the interviews jointly for efficiency's sake, officials said.

Tori Dickinson, Developing Scholars Program task-force member.

Since this issue was raised by Rahman at a Faculty Senate meeting, task-force members have been planning and assessing information at K-State concerning graduation rates. Statistics show that few minority students who take their first college classes at K-State graduate in their first five years.

Task members are working to generate financial support from a grant through the department of education.

Buddy Gray, current K-State Faculty Senate president, said the University of Michigan has a similar program that has been in effect for more than 10 years and has grown from 14 students to more than 900. This program has been adapted at numerous campuses around the country and has proven to be an effective tool for retention and recruitment of undergraduates.

Initially, coordinators hope to start off with a mix of 25 students who would be the first to participate in the interactive course.

"We want to be able to offer this to a variety of students, not just those students who are coming to college with high SAT and ACT scores. We want students with all ranges of scores," Rahman said. "We hope to make this a learning experience for both sides, and in the long run, benefit the university as a whole."

Pro-reform newspapers shut down in Iran

By AFSHIN VALINEJAD
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TEHRAN, Iran — Iranians searched street kiosks in vain for their favorite newspapers Monday, after hard-liners closed down 14 pro-democracy publications in a strike against a pillar of the reform movement.

The shutdown of pro-reform newspapers, part of a crackdown that has seen two journalists jailed in the past three days, is a strong backlash by Islamic hard-liners trying to preserve their power and is a blow against popular President Mohammad Khatami.

The move also showed how much power the hard-liners still hold, despite a crushing defeat by Khatami supporters in recent legislative elections.

The judiciary, which handed down the ban against the newspapers Sunday, has been the hard-liners' most powerful instrument in the power struggle against the movement for social and political reforms that has swelled since Khatami's 1997 election.

"The power struggle in Iran is entering dire straits," said Saeed Leylaz, an analyst and writer for several reformist newspapers. "The press has been the main instrument for Khatami to speak to the people, and if that is taken away from him he is in serious trouble," Leylaz told The Associated Press.

Khatami spoke in public Monday to mark Armed Forces Day but made no mention of the closures or the future of his reforms.

Ten daily newspapers and four weekly or biweekly magazines were closed down by order of the hard-line judiciary in Tehran late Sunday and Monday, the official Islamic Republic News Agency reported.

Only two reformist newspapers

— Mosharekat and Bayan — escaped the ban. It was not clear why they were not included. Azad, which was banned, was on sale Monday, because the daily already had gone to print before the ban. It is unlikely to appear today.

Judiciary statements quoted by IRNA said the publications were closed for "printing material against the lofty Islamic principles and commands."

"Khatami is still strong and very popular among the people, but now he is handicapped without his main pillars of support," said Hossein Qaragozlu, a shopkeeper, who was buying papers.

The closures came three days after Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, the hard-line supreme leader whose powers supersede those of the elected president, said there were 10-15 reformist papers undermining Islamic principles.

On Monday, religious schools around the country were ordered to close by hard-liners to protest a recent conference in Berlin attended by several reformist journalists.

Hard-liners were outraged after footage from the conference was aired last week on state television, showing Iranian exiles criticizing Iran's religious government and a woman dancing in a skimpy outfit. In Iran, women must adhere to a strict Islamic dress code.

The hard-liners, who have ruled by decree since the 1979 Islamic revolution, have been losing popularity to a barrage of newspaper criticism against their heavy-handed policies. The newspapers had turned Khatami, who advocates democracy and the rule of law, into a national hero.

Despite reformists' election victories, the hard-liners still control key institutions, including the military, the broadcast network and the judiciary.

On Sunday, police seized Latif Safari, director of the banned Neshat daily, and took him to Tehran's Evin prison, a day after detaining Akbar Ganji, the nation's top investigative reporter.

Earlier this month, the judiciary upheld the conviction of Mahmoud Shams, editor in chief of Asr-e-Azadegan, giving him a 2 1/2-year jail term on charges of "insulting religious sanctities."

In March, Saeed Hajjarian, another leading journalist, was shot in the face and gravely wounded.

Nearly every leading reformist journalist has been summoned for questioning by the judiciary.

Last week, the outgoing Parliament dominated by hard-liners tightened an existing press law, granting greater powers of prosecution against writers and publishers. The changes have to be endorsed by the hard-line Guardian Council, a likely formality.

Firsova 1st-round draft pick for N.Y. Liberty

BY DEREK BOSS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It was a day of firsts for Olga Firsova and the K-State women's basketball program Tuesday.

The senior was the 13th overall pick in the 2000 WNBA Draft by the New York Liberty and the first Wildcat ever to be selected by the league.

"When they said my name, I was like, 'There's no more Olgas in the draft,' so I knew it had to be me," Firsova said. "Then everybody just started screaming, jumping around, hugging and crying."

Her first-round selection was a bit of a surprise for K-State's all-time shot blocker, as she spent her Tuesday watching the event with teammates, coaches and managers at the K-State women's basketball offices.

"I didn't have any expectations, and I didn't want to get my hopes up," Firsova said. "I put my name into the draft and thought if nothing works out, I would just go to one of the camps and take my chances there."

"This is like a dream come true. I could never have even thought of it happening."

Firsova became the first woman in K-State basketball history to be selected in the first round of any professional draft. Additionally, she was the third member of the Big 12 Conference selected by the WNBA this year.

"We're just ecstatic and absolutely thrilled in Olga's selection," said Deb Patterson, K-State women's basketball head coach. "It's a great honor for us to have her go in the first round. The magnitude of being selected is just enormous."

On Tuesday, New York head coach Richie Adubato said live via satellite on NBA.com that he was most impressed with Firsova's size, physical play and shot-blocking abilities.

"We needed a big presence in the lane, and Olga does that," Adubato said. "In many ways, she is a terrific shot blocker. She has a good touch inside but can go outside. She shot 50-percent on threes."

"She is very mobile and very versatile for a big person and she has a great attitude. She was a top three for us because she certainly fills a need for us."

By looking at her statistics, Firsova is more than qualified to meet that need.

The 6-foot-6-inch center from Kiev, Ukraine, averaged 9.1 points, 6.1 rebounds and 1.7 blocks per game as a Wildcat senior.

The honorable mention All-Big 12 selection ranks first among Wildcat women on the career (100), season (51) and game (7) charts for blocked shots.

She is one of two Big 12 players ever to block 100 shots and the only to do it in just two seasons.

Firsova even tallied the fifth most blocks at K-State in both men's and women's basketball history.

Yet many considered Firsova's draft selection a surprise, considering she entered the draft without an agent and without working out at the combine for personal reasons.

But it was her versatility, size and coachability that were most appealing to several WNBA programs in Tuesday's four-round draft, Patterson said.

Since being picked, Firsova said she now is in the process of getting an agent, and even though she was a first-round selection, she still will have to try out for the Liberty roster.

New York is coming off a 20-18 season in which it reached the WNBA finals, losing the championship to the Houston Comets.

"I think it's something that our entire program is proud of, as she's a part of a championship contending team," Patterson said. "Everyone in that organization understands that Olga has tremendous

Take Back the Pride rally increases students' awareness of rape

STORY BY JAMIE BARRETT

Much as Ordinary Women took back the night earlier this semester, the K-State Men Against Rape Society took back the pride Tuesday night.

About 40 K-State men and women gathered for the Take Back the Pride rally, which was sponsored by MARS to increase K-State students' rape awareness.

Paul English, senior in history and MARS founder, said the rally was important because it helps to increase awareness among men and women alike.

"The whole principle of the march is to show that even though rape does happen and men are the primary perpetrators, the vast majority of men do not rape," English said. "We needed to make a visible statement for the men who do not rape."

English said the MARS has sponsored the rally for four years now.

"We have done this for four years and have seen an increase in participation," English said. "It is an important thing to participate in, because we try to speak to the men about what rape really is."

The rally began on the corner of Manhattan Avenue and Claflin Road with a march through campus to Aggieville. The participants then gathered in Triangle Park to listen to speakers such as Jake Worcester, student body president; Scott Jones, assistant dean of student life; and keynote speaker Dr. River Smith from Cleveland, Ohio.

Worcester said that although K-State is a relatively safe campus, rape does occur and is a problem in any instance.

"Although the instances of rape on our campus is low, even one occurrence is too many," Worcester said.

Nick Lander, junior in psychology and MARS member, said this was the first year a keynote speaker gave a presentation at the rally.

"We were really excited to have Dr. Smith come and talk at the rally," Lander said. "He has been instrumental in founding many organizations dealing with rape as a men's issue."

Smith spoke about rape within the American society and gave many examples and statistics to illustrate his point.

"Every male in every culture belongs to a privileged group, whereas every woman in every culture belongs to an oppressed group," Smith said.

Smith said rape is part of an overall continuum that oppresses women.

"There are many things that keep women oppressed and men in the position of privilege," Smith said.

Lander said the rally was an overall success because it united both men and women on the issue.

"The purpose of MARS is to educate men about rape, because men need to know that it is not only a women's issue but also a men's," Lander said.

Lander said one of the most important aspects of the rally was having both men and women involved in the rally and march.

"Seeing men and women both stand together on an issue makes a big impact," Lander said.

Jennifer Foster, residence hall life coordinator for Ford Hall, said she attended the rally and march because it reminded her of what the Ordinary Women group did earlier this semester.

"I went to the Take Back the Night rally, and it was an awesome experience," Foster said. "I wanted to come and support MARS because I think they were trying to generate the same type of feeling and emotion that the Ordinary Women tried to generate."

Smith said the only real way to fight back against rape and all abuse against women is to become aware of the reality women face.

"What we as men have to do is to listen to the women in our lives, stop the violence and truly learn to love women," Smith said.

Dr. River Smith from Cleveland, Ohio, was the keynote speaker at the Men Against Rape Society Take Back the Pride march on Tuesday. Smith spoke on many issues that have concerned both men and women throughout history.

118th Landon Lecture today

By JENN DAVOREN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State alumnus Gen. Richard Myers will be on campus today to give the 118th speech in the Landon Lecture Series.

Myers, who was instated as vice chairman of the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff on Feb. 29, also serves as the commander in chief of the North American Aerospace Defense Command and the U.S. Space Command.

Charles Reagan, associate to K-State president Jon Wefald, said he contacted Myers early Tuesday concerning the subject of his lecture.

"I found out his speech is called 'Why We Serve,'" Reagan said. "You can guess whatever you want from the title."

The four-star general also will be speaking with students of the College of Engineering and members of K-State's Air Force ROTC detachment during his visit to the university.

The Landon Lecture will take place at 10:30 a.m. today at McCain Auditorium.

MP3 software use slows computer labs

By ANGELA KISTNER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Internet resources at K-State are being abused, and the university is working to put a stop to it.

Computing and Network Services director Harvard Townsend said some students at K-State are using recreational programs that require a substantial portion of the available bandwidth of the K-State system.

One of these programs is Napster, software produced by a new company making it easier to exchange MP3 music files.

"The files are large and chews up a lot of bandwidth," Townsend said.

Other recreational software causing problems are FTP and Warez. Both take up a large amount of bandwidth.

Townsend said any one student using one of these programs doesn't necessarily cause problems.

"But when you add up the numbers, it's an accumulative effect," he said. "As a consequence, expenses are climbing, and we don't have the budget to pay for it."

Townsend said there are three main reasons why these programs need to be restricted.

"It costs us money we don't have," he said. "It is not an infinite resource. It interferes with academic resources."

Classes on campus that use a live high-quality video over the Internet to have a video conference with classes at other universities were being disrupted because of the recreational programs, Townsend said.

The video is sensitive to interference and loses connections, pauses or loses a few seconds of sound.

"It really hurt that class," he said.

At Thursday's Student Senate meeting, there will be a second reading of a resolution of support for restricting this abuse of K-State Internet resources.

Student Body President Jake Worcester said Vice Provost Beth Unger talked to the Senate about making students aware of the problem, and the Senate thought it was an important issue.

"It's really causing a problem for students who are trying to use the Internet for academic uses," he said.

Worcester said Senate wants students to understand the issue so they can better utilize available Internet resources.

"We have to protect the rights of students as a whole to utilize those resources," he said.

Townsend said the university already pinpointed some users of the programs, gave them a warning and requested that they stop.

"Basically, every time they've been cooperative," he said. "We haven't had any repeat offenders."

Townsend said he wants students to be aware of the consequences of using these recreational programs.

"The important thing is to raise awareness of people using the campus network for recreational uses so they recognize what they do impacts other people using the campus network," he said.

Ohio state motto deemed religious, unconstitutional

CINCINNATI — Ohio's motto, "With God, all things are possible," violates the U.S. Constitution as a government endorsement of religion, the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ruled Tuesday.

A panel of the federal court sided with the American Civil Liberties Union, which contended that the words had no secular purpose and appeared to be a government endorsement of the Christian religion.

Ohio took the motto in 1959 from the Bible, specifically Matthew 19:26, which quotes Jesus Christ.

"I read it to mean it's thrown out completely," said Mark Cohn, a lawyer for the ACLU. "It cannot be used by the state as its motto."

The Ohio attorney general was reviewing the decision and had no immediate response, spokeswoman Stephanie Beougher said from Columbus.

The state could appeal the court's 2-1 ruling to the full 13-judge appellate court or ask the Supreme Court to review it.

The ACLU had asked the appeals court to reverse a 1998 decision by a federal judge in Columbus that allowed Ohio to display the motto as long as it does not cite the biblical origin.

Within days of the ruling, workers installed a bronze plaque bearing the state's seal and the motto in a plaza sidewalk leading to one of the main entrances of the Statehouse in Columbus.

The state argued that the motto does not compel people to believe anything, and that to some people it would not have a religious connotation.

Former Gov. George Voinovich said he got the idea to place the motto at the Statehouse during a trade mission to India, where he spotted a public building that bore the phrase, "Government Work is God's Work." Voinovich now is a U.S. senator for Ohio.

The ACLU and the plaintiff it represents, the Rev. Matthew Peterson, a Presbyterian minister in suburban Cleveland, objected to Ohio's use of the motto and challenged all of Ohio's official uses of the motto. It has appeared for years on the Ohio secretary of state's stationery, on some state reports and on Ohio tax returns.

Mild winter helps economy; Kansas unemployment falls

TOPEKA — A relatively mild winter was good news for the state's economy, at least in terms of the number of people keeping jobs.

The Kansas unemployment rate declined in March to 3.3 percent, compared with 3.6 percent in February, the state Department of Human Resources reported Tuesday.

The number of people keeping jobs increased by nearly 8,500 during the month, to more than 1.39 million.

Unemployment rates continued to be a little higher this year than last year, when the figures were as low as they had been in two decades. The March 1999 unemployment rate was only 3.1 percent.

The agency said seasonal trends pushed the jobless rate down in March, most notably extra government hiring.

William Layes, the department's chief of labor-market information services, said as the weather improves, businesses such as lawn services and golf courses hire more workers. Government hiring increases because agencies use lawn services and run golf courses.

He said unemployment in March either has remained constant or decreased every year since 1989.

"A lot of it is conditioned upon the weather," Layes said. "We had a pretty mild winter."

Overall, the number of Kansans with government jobs increased by about 4,700 in March, to more than 250,000.

The number of federal government workers also increased by about 900, and the department attributed that to hiring for this year's census. Layes said more hiring should occur in April.

The jobless rates in three of the state's four largest metropolitan areas followed the state trend and decreased.

The exception was the state's portion of the Kansas City metro area, defined as Johnson, Leavenworth, Miami and Wyandotte counties. The rate there remained constant at 3.2 percent from February to March.

Topeka news. The Senate Ways and Means Committee Tuesday considered using $7 million from the national tobacco settlement to help children be healthy and ready for school.

The money would be spent on a new program that would be based on North Carolina's Smart Start program, which is designed to improve health care and education for children younger than 5.

The funds would come from nearly $10 million that the state plans to allocate on children's programs during fiscal year 2001, which begins July 1. Another $20 million already has been allocated for this fiscal year.

The state expects to receive $1.77 billion in the next 25 years from a national legal settlement between states and large tobacco companies.

Virtually all of that amount is scheduled to go into a trust fund for children's programs.

Last year, the Legislature created the trust fund and the Kansas Children's Cabinet, which is charged with recommending how tobacco settlement money should be spent.

Joyce Cussimano, the cabinet's executive director, told the Senate committee today that the Smart Start program has been very successful in North Carolina.

She said local communities pay for 20 percent of the program's costs and several companies have contributed money.

Sen. Pat Ranson, R-Wichita, said community involvement is "one of the beauties" of Smart Start.

The House Appropriations Committee also is considering how to spend the settlement money.

Chairman David Adkins, R-Leawood, wants to transform the Children's Cabinet into the Kansas Prevention Policy Council, which would be part of the Department of Health and Environment.

The group still would make spending recommendations, but those proposals would be aimed at preventing problems for children occurring later in life, such as teen pregnancy and the use of alcohol, tobacco and drugs.

K-State powerlifting team competes at national competition in Colorado

By LINDA BYRD
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State Powerlifting Team did something it never had done before.

It competed in the Collegiate Powerlifting Nationals in Colorado Springs, Colo., April 15-16.

Team members Joe Hodgson, Homer Espinoza, Laura Williamson and Jamie Stark participated.

"With only four members of the team qualifying for nationals, the odds were kind of stacked against us this year," Hodgson, senior in kinesiology, said.

"We never really expected to make a big impact in the team competition. We were just hoping to do well as individuals, and I think we did that with three out of the four of us placing."

More than 30 colleges and 192 competitors were involved in the drug-free, strictly sanctioned event.

Hodgson said the atmosphere and competition were intense.

"To give you an idea at just how tough a competition it was, out of 192 lifters, no one went nine for nine," he said.

"That means that no one got all of the lifts that they attempted, so everyone was really trying to go for the best lifts and the judging was very strict."

Athletes had three attempts to get their best lifts in the squat, bench press and deadlift. The total pounds of iron weight lifted is what determines where an athlete will place in a competition, and there is a pound-for-pound overall champion.

Hodgson placed 3rd in the 275-pound weight class with a squat of 562 pounds, a bench press of 413 pounds and a deadlift of 590 pounds.

Espinoza, senior in kinesiology, placed 5th in the 198-pound weight class with a squat of 529 pounds, a bench press of 336 pounds and a dead lift of 529 pounds.

Williamson, senior in food and nutrition and exercise science, squatted 258 pounds, benchpressed 110 pounds and deadlifted 303 pounds, placing 3rd in the women's 132-pound weight class.

Although he did not place in the top five out of 24 competitors in the 165-pound weight class, Stark, graduate student in kinesiology, placed 11th.

Powerlifters train differently from most people at the gym.

"We train for a one-rip max, not just to make our biceps larger and chest larger, but to lift our max weight once. It's about pushing to your max ability," Espinoza said.

The four-member team lifted a combined total of 4,855 pounds.

City earns public works association award for efficiency of Anderson Avenue expansion

By DANEDRI THOMPSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The American Public Works Association awarded the City of Manhattan an award for Public Works Project of the Year for its work on the Anderson Avenue expansion project.

"It's just a source of pride. It's always nice to be recognized by your peers," said Jerry Petty, director of Manhattan Public Works.

He said the award is an international award, and communities in the United States and Canada are eligible to participate.

Construction began on Manhattan's project to expand Anderson Avenue in January 1999. The project has been mostly complete since October 1999.

"The only thing left is just some final little clean-up things like little areas of grass seed that didn't come in," Petty said.

The goal of the expansion was to increase the efficiency of the roadway, improve pedestrian and driver safety on Anderson and reduce surface flooding during heavy rainfall. The plan also called for landscaping, which included planting trees and shrubs and building limestone walls.

Petty said the project and the award were the results of a group effort.

He said Kansas Department of Transportation grants, City/University Tax Fund, City Storm Water Fund and City General Obligation Bonds funded the project, and community members including property owners adjacent to Anderson were instrumental in making the project run smoothly.

"I think one of the important things to note is that there were so many people involved," he said. "They played a significant role in making this happen."

Although Petty wasn't certain how many people the expansion project competed against, he said the APWA judged the Anderson expansion on community relations. APWA also looked at a general project overview, construction management, schedule and safety of the project and protection of the environment.

Petty said he thought the city received high marks in each of the categories.

"All of them are weighed equally in the review process," he said. "I think the project scored well in all of them."

Manhattan Mayor Karen McCulloh voted against the expansion project but was pleased that APWA honored Manhattan with the award.

"It shows that we're doing quality work," McCulloh said. "And it's the judgment of your peers."

She said she voted against the project because she thought the city could use more planning time, not because she thought it was a bad idea. She said she is pleased with the outcome of the project, however.

"I think they did an excellent job of engineering and of building with so little intrusion," she said. "They took out an awful lot of trees, but then they put a lot of trees back."

McCulloh said although the progress was a success, she is concerned about solving future transportation problems.

"I think we do have to think as a community and a society of ways to solve our transportation problems without just adding lanes, because soon we're going to pave the world," she said.

Students receive leadership awards

By MAGGIE MARTIN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Leo Prieto and Joe Kordalski, both seniors in social work, were selected as the recipients of the inaugural Pat J. Bosco Outstanding Leadership Studies Student Award at an evening reception April 13.

The award was established in Bosco's name to recognize 30 years of his leadership at K-State, as well as his help in the creation of Leadership Studies and Programs.

Four other students, Trent Benisch, Amanda Michel, Kimberly Peschka and Craig Vinson, also were nominated for the award by faculty and staff of Leadership Studies and Programs.

Nominees were selected for their demonstration of leadership and campus involvement, their academic excellence in leadership studies courses and their commitment and involvement in Leadership Studies and Programs.

"These students have exemplified and demonstrated the ideals of the leadership studies program through their campus leadership, their excellent class performance and their personal sense of character and ethics," Robert

Shoop, professor of educational administration, said. "Both of these young men are prepared to take their place in the work force, and I am confident that they will emerge as recognized leaders in their professions."

Kordalski, who is working at an internship in Kansas City, Mo., said he uses leadership every day.

"At the Children's Shelter, I have everyday interventions with kids," Kordalski said. "I try to model positive behavior and be a good example to these kids, regardless of their age. It is important to try to influence their perception of adults."

Both Kordalski and Prieto said

"The essence of leadership is when one truly helps refine the leadership of others."

— Leo Prieto, senior in social work

they agreed that leadership involves utilizing one's skills to help others reach their potential.

Prieto said he felt honored to win this award, given in honor of one of his greatest mentors.

"To be the first recipient of such a prestigious award has incredible significance," Prieto said. "It is because I have a deep passion for leadership, and it's nice to know some people have felt the effect. That's what leadership is all about."

Kordalski and Prieto both said the mission statement of the leadership studies program was important to live by every day.

"This statement refers to having awareness through understanding and applying it to everyday life," Prieto said.

"It's being able to practice what one preaches in our diverse world. The essence of leadership is when one truly helps refine the leadership of others."

Department makes correct decision with equestrian

Ladies, start your horses. The editorial board is reasonably sure this phrase is not used to start equestrian events — but we're not sure.

The board thinks equestrian involves competitors on horses jumping over things — but, again, that's just an assumption.

In fact, we know very little about the sport of equestrian.

This ignorance is what makes equestrian the correct choice for the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics.

K-State was in a position that required them to add a women's sport because of Title IX, a piece of legislation introduced in 1970s to ensure equity in the athletic programs.

To meet this requirement, K-State added a varsity women's crew team a few years ago.

While this moved the university closer to compliance, the addition of another sport remained necessary. Enter equestrian.

Equestrian emerged as the sport of choice only after a long list had been narrowed to five — soccer, softball, swimming and diving, bowling and equestrian.

Looking at those choices, it seems some would have a more widespread appeal than equestrian — namely soccer and softball.

However, K-State already has sports for both men and women with a widespread appeal — football, basketball, baseball, volleyball and several others.

In addition, many other schools already have soccer and softball programs.

If K-State were to burst onto the scene in one of those sports, the road would be tough.

K-State would have to vie with other programs to garner top recruits.

Few schools offer equestrian teams. However, several are looking into adding one.

By getting in ahead of everyone else, K-State has a chance to get a leg up on those schools still in the preliminary stages.

Most importantly, this is not a sport everyone knows something about.

However, those who do know about it will now have a place to find it.

Granted, equestrian appeals to a narrow audience — but a narrow audience with money.

It is something of a stereotype, but many competitors in and fans of the sport have money.

That money surely will follow them to K-State.

Equestrian also will bring K-State closer to total compliance with Title IX than any of the other sports would have.

It even has a strong foundation in the existing equestrian club.

So it's time to find out what equitation, horsemanship and correct body position are.

Saddle up.

Sleep is NOT an Option

Nocturnal lifestyle brings incredible challenges

I've always been a night person. In the past year, I've become fully nocturnal. I wish I could say it's been worth it.

Now, I think all of us in this state of higher education know something of nocturnal tendencies. We'll flirt with it a bit — stay up until 1 or 2 a.m. Maybe the more adventurous will stay up until 4 or 5 a.m. — maybe we'll even pull an all-nighter or two.

But being hardcore nocturnal ... it's a lifestyle choice, and not a choice to be taken lightly, and you better make damn sure it's worth the investment. It's living day-in and day-out against the rhythm of the sun, and let's be honest — it hurts like hell.

There's a gland in the brain called the pineal gland — this gland produces melatonin, a hormone that assists in inducing sleep.

Sunlight impedes melatonin production and keeps us awake. It's natural for humans to be diurnal (operating during normal daytime hours) — it takes effort, determination or serious affliction to be nocturnal.

Nocturnes get no respect. Common perception is it's cool to be nocturnal, after all, and I admit it has its share of upsides. For one, traffic's a lot better. There's a lot more parking spaces empty at 1 a.m. than 1 p.m. And ... er ... Huh. I was sure there were more upsides than that.

Maybe not, though. Because even though there's a late shift — and you've gotta work it because nobody else can/will — the rest of this society is diurnal, operating in the world dominated by a Teletubby-like, smiling-infant sun.

The nighttime world — justifiably so, given our small numbers and limited social skills — often is neglected, children of a scowling moon.

Your eating options are not limited by "What do you like?" or "What sounds good right now?" but "What's still open?" Half the cable channels show infomercials while you're awake. Convenience store clerks know you by coffee-cup size and, eventually, name.

You watch the early-morning repeats of "SportsCenter" and "World News Now," lip-syncing with the anchors when they hit the familiar parts.

Your drive home is littered with satellite radio morning shows — professional morons laughing at each other making insipid jokes while you wrestle in vain with the dial searching for just one stupid song, for Pete's sake.

Sleep, in the nocturne's world, becomes a precious commodity, and those who would deny it to you are blood enemies. I turn off my phone. I close the shades to my east-facing window and bury my head in my futon.

Guests who stop by unannounced lose fingers or arms as I attack them, frothing and biting (or, worse, I dismiss them, groggy and incoherent, and never remember the encounter). Salespeople who happen by simply ... disappear, leaving only fingernail marks on the doorjamb.

I'm still amazed by the events which cause me to set my alarm. Going to see a movie? Need to get to the bookstore before it closes? Want to catch a sunset? Set the alarm.

I still set my alarm for class — the only difference being mine is a 7 p.m. class. My classmates are struggling to stay focused after a full day of activity, and to me it feels like an 8:30 a.m. Latin class. Group meetings, staff meetings, instructor conferences — all on a completely different timetable.

Which brings me to the social sphere. As a nocturne, you don't have one.

Even if you set your alarms, take out that special someone ... then what? What're you going to do? "Would you like to spend the night with me?" "Uh, actually, I'm not tired. You mind if I read a book?" Romance isn't the first casualty of the nocturnal lifestyle, but it dies an early death regardless.

If natural social barriers don't enter into the early freeze, when you're looking at the beautiful face of your true love, imagining all the lovely, delicious melatonin within ... sweet, sleep-giving melatonin ... they usually leave before you can get a straw (Intriguing note: spell-check refuses the term "all-nighter" and suggests instead "alienator." Insightful).

ADAM HAYES COLLEGIAN

If the possibility of changing circadian rhythms — going from diurnal to nocturnal or vice-versa — appears in your near future, do a little research (or just scream "No!" and run howling out the door).

If nothing else, you'll find a wealth of intriguing information available. For example, did you know there are four stages of sleep and nine stages of alertness? Nine! I can't manage three!

Ahem. Sorry. As I was saying, maybe you're capable of weathering the change. Maybe it's right up your alley. Maybe you're lucky enough to have a choice. But the night's got a price most don't see.

To the night shift of the world — you have my respect, living against the grain of our society to do work nobody else wants to do. I'm proud to have spent some time in your midst.

But all good things...

Honor, dignity not worth sacrificing for high-paying job

I am an example of what not to do.

After a year, I still am a hot topic at my previous place of employment. I learned the hard way that sacrificing your principles is not worth any amount of money. Recently, my friend discovered it, also.

This friend and I both worked at a local Mexican restaurant. After calling in sick for the second time in nine months, my friend's manager scheduled a meeting with her. After praising her skills and abilities, the manager threatened her job for repeated absences. An argument ensued, and suddenly my friend was told she was expendable and was being taken off the schedule. Three years of loyalty, and in two minutes she was fired for having an opinion about what these people thought of her.

Fairness and respect are not factors considered in this place, and consequently, not many people leave peacefully.

My dignity there was hard-earned and long in coming.

I was on my second shift back from a knee injury when I slipped on water leaking out of the ice machine and promptly reinjured the knee because the rubber mats that were supposed to protect me already had been moved for the night. I had been medically cleared to work and had my knee brace on, so I filed for workers' compensation to pay for the MRI I needed.

You would think I had sold out my Mafia boss.

Coming back to work three months later was like being thrown into a shark pool. My "friends" made comments on the free money I had received while eating bonbons and watching soaps. Explaining that I had not made enough money to cover the bills, and that crutches weren't much fun outside of party tricks, was useless.

My first night back, my manager announced I was too expensive. He said I only could work in sections of tables without stairs, was not supposed to carry heavy trays if somebody could do it for me and I could not have a closing shift anymore. I offered to roll up the mats at the end of the night so I could stay late. I was denied.

I went from being a veteran server with good sections to beginning sections because I was told, "The people who have worked hard while you took your vacation deserve the good sections." People who came in later than I left earlier and if I tried to ask off for certain shifts, I was told it was based on seniority — and I was near the bottom — even after being there for more than a year.

If I was scheduled to work consecutive multiple shifts and showed fatigue, I was ridiculed. I actually started crying once when my manager berated me so badly in the kitchen that two co-workers finally had to step in to defend me. I got yelled at for things I saw blatantly being done every day by other employees.

Until that glorious day when I decided I couldn't handle it anymore.

I had a set of non-tipping repeat customers who had eaten once when the restaurant was tremendously busy. I knew this day was my chance to prove my skills to them, so I sucked up, smiling all the way. Not only did they stiff me again, but they wrote impossible lies on the back of the ticket to get me in trouble. I laughed and showed the ticket to the manager, blindly assuming he would not question my innocence.

I was wrong. So, I quietly wrote down their addresses from their checks, went home and wrote a letter to them, making it clear how I felt about the way they unjustly treated me.

No names were mentioned, no names were called and I never have written anything so beautifully. My basic premise was that if bringing a stranger down was a highlight of their lives, they were pathetic.

So was the job. When the customers inevitably complained, my manager tried to lecture me about choosing my battles. I knew the job was over, so I looked him in the eye and told him I had chosen my battle.

And I had won.

I am told as a story now.

I am infamous.

I am worth noting as a sighting around town, and the gossip I hear about me not only is untrue, but not worth my time anymore.

But my friend did not deserve to be treated that way, and optimistically had hoped her loyalty and hard work would give her credit. In any other business, it would, but the politics in that restaurant are not based on reality, and unfortunately, my friend suffered.

I wasn't seeking revenge for what I did. I know it's not the smartest way to handle your job. But I don't regret it. What I did was no worse than what my employer or customer did, and I still was the only one who paid for it. And until things change, which apparently they haven't because I heard the ice machine still leaks, good employees are going to leave, one way or another.

After all, we're expendable.

Sororities to compete in Derby Days this week

■ Sigma Chi fraternity's philanthropy to benefit non-profit organization.

By KELLY EVENSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Sororities will compete this week, not to proclaim a winner, but to help raise money for charity.

Derby Days, the philanthropic event for the Sigma Chi fraternity, is an annual national event that benefits the Children's Miracle Network, said Shawn Hickey, co-chairman for Derby Days. He said sororities on campus compete in a variety of events, and most of the funds are raised from a package sold to participants. The package costs $15, and includes a T-shirt, 32 oz. mug and booklet.

"The purpose of the event is to raise money for CMN," Hickey said. "It is a fun thing for the sororities to participate in because it gets them together, so they can give something back to a good cause."

Hickey said the Derby Days begins with a kick-off party at 8 tonight at Silverado Saloon. Live, improvisational comedy from Kansas City, Mo., will be available. Sororities also will compete in a volleyball tournament at 5:30 p.m. Thursday at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex, as well as a dance contest at 7:30 p.m. Friday at the Wareham Opera House.

Competition will wrap up Saturday when sororities compete in field events such as chicken fights and a slumber relay at Manhattan City Park. Hickey said $5,500 was raised last year, and he said it appears that monies raised this year will exceed last year's total.

Members of the Alpha Delta Pi sorority cheer on participants in the tug of war contest at Derby Day at the Sigma Chi house in spring 1998. This year's Derby Days will begin with a kick-off party at 8 p.m. Wednesday at Silverado Saloon and continue with events through Saturday.

Alpha Chi Omega sorority and junior in public relations and marketing, said the sorority enjoys participating in Derby Days because it gives it a chance to donate to a good cause. She also said the event is fun and gives members the opportunity to interact with other sororities on campus.

"It is really fun to see all of the sororities get involved in one event," Harwood said. "This is not a competition, but the opportunity to do something fun that is different from other philanthropies available."

Hickey said he thinks the reason sororities like to become involved in Derby Days is because it gives them a chance to do something that is fun, and raises money for charity.

"This is something fun for them to participate in, and a good time for everyone involved," Hickey said. "It gives them a challenge and a good opportunity to help someone else."

Julie Karrer, member of Alpha Delta Pi sorority and junior in pre-optometry, said the event is well received by sororities because it offers different events in which everyone can participate.

She said even if people do not participate, it is something fun to watch and is different from other philanthropies.

"This is something that we have traditionally done in the past because it is fun and a good way to earn money for a good cause," Karrer said. "There is something for everyone, so a lot more people can join in. It is not only entertaining to participate, but also to watch. Other philanthropies just don't have the same appeal."

CMN is a non-profit organization that helps children by raising funds and awareness for 170 children's hospitals throughout North America. More than 14 million children each year who are afflicted with cancer, birth defects, AIDS and other serious illnesses are helped by monies raised.

Prosecutors ask for last-minute delay in Lockerbie bombing trial

By ANTHONY DEUTSCH
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

THE HAGUE, Netherlands — Scottish prosecutors Tuesday requested a further delay in the trial of two Libyans accused in the 1988 Lockerbie bombing, after the defense submitted new evidence and a list of more than a hundred witnesses less than two weeks before proceedings were to start.

If granted by the special Scottish court at Camp Zeist, a former U.S. air base 45 miles east of The Hague, the trial could be bumped back several weeks — its third postponement since the original starting date of June 7, 1999.

Proceedings were scheduled to begin May 3 following two defense-requested delays since Libyan leader Moammar Gadhafi surrendered Abdel Basset Ali al-Megrahi and Lamen Khalifa Fhimah last year to stand trial for the murder of 270 people, including 189 Americans, killed in the Dec. 21, 1988, bombing of Pan Am Flight 103 over Lockerbie, Scotland.

Prosecutors said the delay was needed to help them prepare to deal with 119 new witnesses and further evidence submitted by the defense April 20.

Most of the new witnesses are Libyans, but the list also includes Americans, Maltese, Swedes and Germans, the prosecution said.

"Given the number, apparent range and geographical location of defense witnesses, the prosecutor does not consider that he can properly proceed to trial without the proper investigation of this evidence," the Scottish Crown Office said in a statement from Edinburgh.

"How many times do we have to put our lives on hold?" asked Susan Cohen, whose 20-year-old daughter Theodora was on Flight 103.

She said prosecutors had promised families of the victims there would be no further delays, and called the request a frightening and unsettling sign of difficulties with the case.

Alistair Bonnington, law professor at Glasgow University, said that while the request is likely to be granted, the defense lawyer's timing in presenting the new material could harm their case.

"It will not put them in a good order with the court," he said. "To expect the crown to prepare in that time is just ridiculous."

At a pretrial hearing in December, prosecutors submitted a list of 1,172 witnesses, including intelligence agents from several countries, and 2,347 pieces of evidence constituting their case against the Libyans.

A pretrial hearing will take place Thursday at Camp Zeist to rule on the prosecution's application.

The request follows reports of troubles in the prosecution's case following Chief Prosecutor Lord Andrew Hardie's resignation in January.

He was replaced by Colin Boyd, Scotland's solicitor-general and the former No. 2 man on the prosecution team.

Prosecutors say the Libyans planted a rigged Toshiba cassette recorder in an unaccompanied suitcase on a flight from the Mediterranean island of Malta to Frankfurt, Germany, and had it routed onto Flight 103 from London with stolen luggage tags.

Firsova said the Liberty's recent successes make for an exciting trip as she prepares to make the move from the Little Apple to the Big Apple.

"I don't know a lot about this team, but I'll find out more," she said. "It's just exciting to play at that level — it'll be a good opportunity for me."

Auburn said Firsova's acquisition will be a good opportunity for the Liberty as well.

"Olga is much more physical,"

he said. "I think she will hold the block. I think she will be able to score inside. I think she will be able to compete with the bigger players in our conference."

The Liberty are set to begin their 2000 season on Memorial Day.

Aside from Firsova, former Wildcat Shanelle Stires (1993-95) was the 56th pick overall in the draft by the Minnesota Lynx and head coach Brian Agler.

Cats travel to Creighton

By SAM STIERS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State's baseball team (16-23, 3-17 Big 12) continues its road, taking on Creighton University (30-12), at 3:30 p.m. today in Omaha, Neb.

K-State is looking to avenge an early season loss to the Bluejays and snap their three-game losing streak.

The Cats were upended by the Jays, 7-1, Feb. 23 in Manhattan. In this first meeting, both teams were plagued by poor defense and soggy conditions. Creighton committed three errors during the game, and K-State committed four errors, leading to four unearned runs. The Jays hit two two-run home runs and scored two more off wild pitches by K-State pitcher Kurt Lehmann. Both pitching staffs pitched well; K-State's allowed only six hits.

Josh Cavender posted two hits for K-State, while Chad Tabor knocked in the Wildcats' only run of the game. K-State starter Luke Robertson took the loss, while going just two innings and allowing four earned runs.

The Cats enter the contest with a string of non-conference wins. K-State has not lost to a non-Big 12 opponent since a 4-1 defeat at the hands of Harvard University on March 26.

The Cats had won seven straight games before being swept last weekend in their three-game series at Iowa State. Creighton split their weekend series against Southwest Missouri State, winning the last game of the series 12-0.

Creighton this season has scored 336 runs and has 43 home runs. The Jays' pitching staff has been solid all season and has a team ERA of 4.68.

The Jays are not ranked now, but have been ranked as high as 17th in the Baseball America Poll.

Freshman returns from injury, illness

By MIKE VIETTI
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Baseball was taken away from K-State freshman Pat Maloney for nearly two years of his life starting his senior year in high school, in 1998, until the 2000 season.

As a result, Maloney has made baseball and opposing teams pay for it this year, as his .364 batting average indicates.

Maloney's hiatus from the national pastime started his senior year at St. Thomas Aquinas High School in Overland Park, when he was struck with mononucleosis. The illness kept him from playing most of the season and summer baseball.

Maloney declined scholarship offers from community colleges and a Division II school to walk-on at K-State and show the coaching staff he belonged at the Division I level.

Lady luck frowned again. Maloney injured his throwing shoulder during fall practice last season, forcing him to have surgery and sit out his second season in a row.

"Having to quit baseball — it was a hard thing to do. I'd never gone a couple of weeks without playing baseball," Maloney said. "It was like everything got taken away from me. It was something I loved to do, and it got taken away from me."

Focusing the lack of a scholarship, in addition to not having played for two seasons, Maloney has returned to the diamond in full force. Despite starting in only 22 of the Cats' 39 games, Maloney is fifth on the team in RBIs with 22, second in home runs with three, tied for second with three triples, second with a .557 slugging percentage and seventh with 32 hits.

All that, and he's only a freshman.

"It's good for a freshman to hit .270, let alone putting up the numbers he is," K-State head coach Mike Clark said. "You don't expect anybody to hit that well, but we knew Pat was a good hitter. It was just a matter of getting him at-bats."

Another headache for the former high school pitcher and outfielder is that he is learning a new position — first base — while his shoulder slowly recovers.

"It's pretty hard because it's not something I'm used to playing, and it's not my favorite position out in the field," Maloney said.

Incumbent Allen, Scobey vie to be starting running back

By MIKE VIETTI
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Consider K-State's running back battle to be a classic example of a teacher-pupil situation.

Fifth-year senior David Allen fits the mold of the teacher, with junior community college transfer Josh Scobey filling the pupil's role.

In the competitive atmosphere that is K-State football, one might not expect a senior with his last chance at earning a starting spot to accept the role of teaching his possible replacement, but that isn't the case.

"Just being the type of personality I am, I just want to be out there to help everybody," Allen said. "I'm a team player, and I want to win just as bad as the next guy."

"Whatever I can do to help the team that makes the team better, I'm going to do."

As a second team NJCAA All-American transfer, one might not think Scobey would be willing to take advice from the man with whom he is competing, but that, too, is not the case.

"This is still a learning process for me," Scobey said. "I've only practiced with Kansas State 11 times. It's going to take a lot more time than just 15 practices for me to really grasp this system."

Spring game set for Saturday

By NICK BRATKOVIC
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State spring football season is coming to a close, and the team's practice will be showcased Saturday in the spring football game.

Kickoff is set for 1:10 p.m., and K-State head coach Bill Snyder said it will showcase the program's players.

Snyder also said it will be a chance for the players to get into game-time experience.

"We will play our No. 1's on offense against our No. 1's on defense, and so on," Snyder said.

Tickets for the game are being sold for $5 for adults and $2 for students, and will go on sale at 10 a.m. at K-State's East and West Stadiums.

They can be ordered in advance through the K-State athletic ticket office.

Proceeds for the event will be split between the K-State cheer squad and Hale Library.

Despite the fact that he might lose the starting spot to Allen, Scobey said he appreciates what Allen has done to make him a better player.

"I think that's all about being a leader, which I think he is," Scobey said.

"He knows that's one of his responsibilities, to help not only me, but the younger guys and to help them get a feel for everything and also competing because he's competing, but I think that's just his character. He's that type of person — he doesn't really mind helping the others."

Allen, a phenom at returning punts, actually has started only seven games as a running back at K-State.

For his career, Allen has rushed for 553 yards on 106 carries with seven rushing touchdowns.

On the other side is Scobey, who signed with K-State out of high school but did not qualify academically and played the past two years at Northeastern Oklahoma A&M. The Del City, Okla., native rushed for a school record 2,423 yards and 31 touchdowns in his career.

Possibly factoring into the equation is last season's leading rusher, Joe Hall. K-State head coach Bill Snyder said at his Tuesday press conference that Hall is in classes, working toward regaining his eligibility for the fall and possibly could rejoin the team.

For now, Snyder said Allen is the number one running back entering the spring game, but that each back still has areas to improve on.

"It's easy to say, well, David has spent his time and has a feeling for everything because he's been there for a long time, but he didn't take all that many snaps," Snyder said. "He needs an awful lot of work,

Beasley should be KSU's starting QB next season

If you've got pent-up frustration waiting for a release as school winds down and projects are coming due, my column is the place for you this morning, my friend. Get ready to vent.

If you're near a computer, go ahead and type in my e-mail address (rb4655@ksu.edu). Don't forget the clever subject heading for that irate e-mail ("You suk" is a personal favorite).

If you're not on the Information Superhighway, go ahead and dial 395-444 on your telephone. You can dial that last "4" and start ranting after you read this next sentence.

Jonathan Beasley should be K-State's starting quarterback next season.

Go ahead, fire away with the angry e-mails and Campus Fourum insults. Get it out of your system. Yell if you must, but keep reading after.

It's a well-known fact that most K-State fans weren't satisfied with Beasley's performance last year in his first season as a starter after two years of being treated to Michael Bishop's heroics.

At times last year, fans wanted Adam Helm as the starter. They wanted Eli Roberson as the starter. It seemed like fans would've accepted anyone this side of Jason Smargiasso in there, just as long as it got Beasley off the field.

Much of that sentiment has lingered into this year. Fans still aren't sold on Beasley. But before this weekend's spring football game, I felt the need to nip the annual QB controversy (Beasley vs. Roberson, for those keeping score) in the bud. Beasley should be the man. Like it or not, there are a few good reasons why.

First off, in criticizing Beasley, fans invariably compare Beasley's numbers with Bishop's and find them lacking. That's because they compare Bishop's senior and returning starter season to Beasley's first as a starter, which isn't a fair comparison.

Try thinking back to Bishop's junior year for a second. Remember how painfully uncomfortable Bishop seemed trying to run the K-State offense that first year?

I actually remember my friends and I shouting "Oh, God! Please don't!" every time Bishop began to audible. I can't print what we said when he actually dropped back to pass.

A lot of succeeding as a quarterback for any team has to do with mastering the playbook. And mastering the Greater Los Angeles White Pages-sized tome that holds the secrets to Snyder's offensive scheme would trip up Stephen Hawking, let alone a 21-year-old first-time starter.

Even using a stripped-down, Tecmo Super Bowl version of the playbook, Bishop still struggled in his first season to turn his athletic potential into on-field production.

Remember Bishop getting yanked from a game against the mighty University of Ohio? Remember him getting pulled at Texas Tech in favor of Beasley, who saved the Cats with a late touchdown run?

Though his amazing senior year glossed over Bishop's difficulties in many fans' memories, the truth was that not many people were sold on Bishop at all until his fantastic performance against Syracuse in the Tostitos Fiesta Bowl. Beasley's stats last season actually bettered Bishop's junior numbers, yet Beasley still is judged against the standard of Michael Bishop. Heisman Trophy runner-up.

Now, Eli Roberson is the people's choice to lead the Cats. Students want him. Fans want him. Alumni want him. Some players surely want him.

Basically, everyone who's not Bill Snyder or Jonathan Beasley's mother wants to see the redshirt freshman get his shot.

To be sure, Roberson is an exciting player. The phrase "The Next Michael Bishop" has been attached to his name more than once.

But the guy hasn't taken a single snap in a college game yet, and it's a bit of a stretch to assume that trading his headset for a football helmet is all it will take to make him another Bishop.

Have you read "A Tale of Two Cities?" Quick — quote the third line on page 148. Too late — you just got sacked. Again, it comes back to the playbook.

Even with three years of training and prior playing experience, Beasley struggled at times to operate the offense last season. He proved that doing it in practice and under game pressure are two entirely separate issues.

He'll be better in those game situations this year. Roberson won't. Roberson has no experience. Nada. Zip. And the word is that although Roberson is throwing well in spring ball, he still is miles behind Beasley with the playbook.

Athletic or not, it will be tough for him to handle the hundreds of plays, audibles and adjustments he'll have to correctly choose each game, especially with hostile fans screaming at him and large angry men waiting to rip his head off.

That's why the choice should be Beasley. He gives the rest of a talented K-State offense the best chance to strut its stuff.

Roberson has many years to improve and to star for K-State, so let him take his time and do it right. Beasley's time is now, and, like Bishop, his improvement from junior to senior year might surprise you. Give peace a chance.

MALONEY

"There's a lot more thinking involved. You have to be aggressive towards the baseball, yet be able to get back to the bag if it's hit to you."

Maloney said he would like to move back to the outfield once his shoulder is completely healed, but still would want to do whatever is best for K-State.

Actually, he said, he simply is happy to even be on the field after his two-year debacle.

"It's made me not take things for granted — like playing every day," Maloney said. "If I have a lazy day, it kind of makes me think back to when I couldn't play for a year or two to where it makes me want to play hard every day at 100 percent and not just go through the motions."

After reaching fairly lofty statistics through his first season, one might expect that Maloney's career goals would be based on those numbers. But just as any coach would wish a player to say, Maloney's ultimate career goal is success in the Big 12 Tournament.

"This team we have is still really young," Maloney said.

"We have a good chance to not only be in the Big 12 Tournament, but have a good chance of winning it."

didn't get probably as much work as he should have.

"Josh Scobey, being a newcomer, got an ample amount of work during the spring and has made progress well," Snyder said.

"I think it will be a competitive position by the time we get to the middle of two-a-days."

While each runner is quick to praise the other, both still aren't ready to concede the starting position. Being a senior, Allen said there is added pressure to be the starter, but he doesn't mind.

"I kind of like the pressure, it's just more enjoyable that you have something to look forward to," Allen said.

"This is your senior year, and you don't want to go out a loser in your senior year, so I think that gives you motivation to go out and work even harder, being a senior."

Scobey said he's anxious to prove himself to Wildcat fans Saturday, but that ultimately, a decision will be made on the starter and everyone will have to live with it.

"It's all part of the game — the best man is obviously the winner," Scobey said.

"It's just something that's always been a part of the game. You win some, you lose some."

Royals' owner has no plans for changes

■ Despite Royals' recent losing streak, new owner promises no hasty decisions will be made.

By DOUG TUCKER
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — The Kansas City Royals, fresh off an 0-9 road trip, got some reassuring news Tuesday from their new owner.

Meeting with the team shortly before its game with Tampa Bay, David Glass assured everyone he planned no hasty decisions despite the fact it lost 97 games in 1999 and is off to another miserable start.

"I wanted to tell them exactly what's going to happen," said the retired CEO of Wal-Mart Inc.

"I told them not to expect us to come in and make a lot of changes."

Glass, who bought the team for $96 million, met with the Royals just before they began an 11-game homestand, their longest of the season.

He spoke for about 15 minutes, and his remarks must have been particularly pleasing to third-year manager Tony Muser.

Muser has come under criticism after an 0-9 road trip to New York, Minnesota and Seattle.

"I think Tony Muser is one of the best managers in baseball," Glass said he told the players. "And he's exactly the right guy for this team at this time. He has my 100-percent support, as well as the coaches."

Dan Glass and Dan's 19-year-old son Dane also met with the team. Dan, 43, will have an as-of-yet unspecified front-office job with the team.

"The whole objective was to talk to the team and tell them that our family's commitment is long-term," David Glass said. "There were three generations in there. I want them to know that for the foreseeable future I want our family to be involved in the ownership of this team."

Glass is also not going to let anyone make excuses for his so-called small-market club.

"When people talk about largest markets

"I want us over time to become a model franchise the other small markets demographically can look at."

— David Glass,
Royals' owner and small markets, and they reference small markets, I want them to say, 'except for Kansas City,'" Glass said.

"I want us over time to become a model franchise the other small markets demographically can look at."

Nevertheless, this was not the way the Royals intended to make their home debut under their new owner.

The discouraging 0-9 road trip came on the heels of an exhilarating 6-1 homestand.

"I can sit here and speculate on a thousand things, but that really doesn't mean anything," Muser said.

"That road trip is behind us. We've had a day off to kind of get away."

Muser is preaching to the Royals to try to find a positive in the long losing streak.

"If we take it as a learning experience, that's the important thing — to regroup mentally and get back to what we know we can do and play some good, solid baseball," he said.

Report says system has racial disparities

■ 58 percent of youth in adult prisons are black.

By ANJETTA MCQUEEN
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — A black youth is six times more likely to be locked up than a white peer, even when charged with a similar crime and when neither has a prior record, a new civil rights report revealed Tuesday.

The report also contends that racial bias exists at every step of the juvenile-justice process.

Many policies and practices have led to a cumulative disadvantage for black and Latino youth, civil-rights leaders and youth advocates said as they released the report by the Youth Law Center. The National Council on Crime and Delinquency, a criminal-justice think tank, did the research.

Minority youth are more likely than white youth who commit comparable crimes to be referred to juvenile court, be detained, face trial as adults and be jailed with adults, the report said.

"It is astounding our nation can tolerate such gross inequality," said William Spriggs, director of research and public policy for the Urban League. "We cannot have a justice system that works this way."

The report comes at a time when high-profile violence — such as Monday's shooting of several youth following a scuffle at the National Zoo's annual black family celebration — is driving harsher juvenile punishment even as the rate of crime by young people decreases.

Since 1992, 47 states have expanded their laws to punish more juveniles as adults not only for murder but also for drug crimes, weapons possession and burglary. The report calls for states to stop incarcerating young people with adults, noting three in four youths imprisoned with adults are minorities.

"We're taking youngsters, children, and putting them in the worst location," Spriggs said. "It reverses a long trend in American policy not to have children imprisoned with hardened adult criminals."

Researchers used data from state and federal arrest records, juvenile court actions, detention, waivers to adult court and incarceration.

They found, for example, that black youth are 15 percent of the population younger than 18 but make up one-third of youth referred to, formally processed by and convicted in juvenile court.

Blacks also account for 40 percent of the youths sent to adult courts and 58 percent of the youths sent to adult prison, said the report, "And Justice For Some." The Urban League and other civil-rights groups joined in its release.

Figures for Latino youth might be understated because most state court and prison records designate them as white, said Brent Wilkes of the League of United Latin Americans.

The groups nonetheless praised the comprehensive report — which followed several recent juvenile-justice studies — as hard evidence of something they've long suspected: Minority youth are victims of racial bias built into the justice system.

Even when types of crime were considered, minorities were more likely to go to jail or prison.

Among youth with no prior record arrested for violent crimes, including murder, rape and robbery, 137 of every 100,000 blacks were incarcerated, compared with 15 of every 100,000 whites.

For drug offenses, which can carry a wide range of penalties, the number was 48 for black youth and only 1 out of 100,000 for whites.

Critics say the skewed numbers could mean simply that black teens and children are committing more crimes or more serious crimes. Researchers admit determining that is much more complicated.

But they said that many policies discriminate against low-income youth — who are overwhelmingly minority, from single-parent homes or in foster care.

"Obviously racial profiling, targeting patrols in certain low-income neighborhoods and racial bias within the justice system contributes significantly to the stark disparities confirmed in this report," said Hilary O. Shelton, Washington bureau director for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

The groups said Congress should give the Justice Department at least $100 million to study and fix racial disparities.

It also should keep requiring states that get federal juvenile justice grants to address the issue, said Rep. Bobby Scott, D-Va., a member of the House Judiciary Committee, which oversees most juvenile justice laws and programs.

That requirement is missing from a Senate version of the juvenile justice bill held up by gun-control disputes, Scott said.

Senate begins debating victims' rights amendment

By JANELLE CARTER
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — In the latest effort to amend the Constitution, the Senate began considering an amendment Tuesday that would grant victims of violent crimes certain rights.

On an 82-12 vote, the Senate agreed to begin debate on a victims' rights measure. A vote on the amendment itself could occur by the end of the week, but some Democrats have indicated they might try to delay it with a lengthy debate on gun control.

Sponsors of the amendment said it is needed to balance constitutional protections that suspects and criminals receive under the original Bill of Rights.

"The United States Constitution guarantees 15 separate rights to criminal defendants and each of these rights was established by amendment to the Constitution," Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., said. "There is not one word written in the U.S. Constitution on behalf of crime victims."

Opponents accused the amendment's backers of trifling with the Constitution. "Some of my colleagues apparently think it (the Constitution) is a rough draft, available for amendment at a whim," Sen. Byron Dorgan, D-N.D., said.

The amendment specifies that victims of crimes or their families would be guaranteed such rights such as reasonable notice of court proceedings and an offender's release or escape, the right to attend and be heard at legal proceedings and court-ordered restitution.

Last month, the Senate rejected by just four votes a constitutional amendment to ban flag burning. A two-thirds majority — 67 votes in the Senate — is required in each house to advance a constitutional amendment. It then must be ratified by at least 35 state legislatures.

Sen. Frank Lautenberg, D-N.J., said he would use the victims' rights debate to press his and President Clinton's demand for new restrictions, including up to a 72-hour waiting period, on the sale of guns at gun shows. The Senate passed such a measure last year, but the House rejected it. Republican leaders have rejected calls since then for a meeting to resolve the differences over gun legislation.

Generation X neglected by political advertising, group says

By LAURA MECKLER
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Political ads are not exactly the most popular images on television, but a Generation X group says young people are feeling neglected because they don't see enough of them.

In reaching for viewers most likely to vote, campaigns advertise during programs with a disproportionately older audience, according to a study being released Tuesday by Third Millennium, an advocacy group for Generation Xers, that documented a widely used strategy.

The group said the practice robs young people of a substantial source of political information, further alienating them from the process.

"Campaigns are guilty of neglecting the same people they claim to be embracing," said the report, which analyzed presidential campaign ads in four cities important to this year's primaries.

"All seniors and near-seniors need to do is sit back and watch the programs they seemingly enjoy watching. The political information will come to them."

Not so for young people. Using data on television viewing and political advertising trends, the study found that on average, just 17 percent of ad viewers were ages 18 to 34, although these people made up 26 percent of the voting-age population.

The research essentially unravels from the back end what political pros take as gospel on the front:

Campaigns spend their money to reach people most likely to vote.

"It's a vicious cycle of mutual neglect," said Richard D. Thau, president of Third Millennium. "In a chicken-and-egg scenario, who's more to blame, the chicken or the egg?"

Viewers of all ages could get a steady diet of political ads if they watched TV news. Forty-four percent of ads aired before, during or after a news program.

But young people are less likely to watch TV news, the report said. Meanwhile, in Manchester, N.H., just five presidential ads aired on "Ally McBeal."

"We're kind of the forgotten group," said Emily Fredrix, 20, a native of Solon, Ohio, who is attending Washington University in St. Louis. Her friends don't talk or care about politics. "I'm almost seen like a weirdo because I care so much about voting."

But her friends could change. Fredrix said: "If they bought a spot on 'Dawson's Creek,' that would be great."

She said, though, that the ads must address issues young people care about. And the report suggests campaigns have to get more creative in capturing a media generation's attention.

From Dec. 1, 1999, through March 7, the study examined media markets in Manchester, N.H., in the leadoff primary state; Greenville-Spartanburg, S.C., where Republicans waged a hard-fought primary; and Los Angeles and New York, which voted on Super Tuesday.

Combining the four markets, just 36 ads ran during "Friends," and 16 ran during "The Simpsons," including syndicated reruns. "Wheel of Fortune" and "Jeopardy!" were more popular choices during the same time slots.

Meanwhile, the "Today" show attracted 651 ads.

Kathleen Hall Jamieson, dean of the Annenberg School for Communication at the University of Pennsylvania, who studies political ads, said campaigns simply are hunting where the ducks are.

In 1972, the first presidential year in which 18-year-olds could vote, no one knew how influential they would be and campaigns spent considerable time and money courting young people. But it quickly became clear that they were much less likely to vote.

"If you have a finite amount of money, where do you put your money?" Jamieson said. "You put your money where you'll get the highest yield. You'd be foolish not to."

A better way to increase participation by young people, she said, is to boost civics lessons and encourage public-service campaigns like MTV's "Rock the Vote."

Third Millennium argues that campaigns, too, have a responsibility to broaden their reach, but acknowledges young people's responsibility in the equation, documenting their low turnout in presidential primaries this year.

FIELDS OF fire

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 26, 2000

ABOVE: Marc Johnson, senior in agronomy, rides in a trailer being pulled behind an all-terrain vehicle while he sets fire to part of the Rannells Flint Hills Prairie Preserve south of Manhattan off Kansas Highway 177. Johnson has been helping Clenton Owensby, professor of range management, burn at the preserve for the past two years.

LEFT: Canaan Ohlde, senior in agronomy, uses a drip torch to set fire to the dead, dry prairie grass at the Rannells, south of Manhattan. Ohlde has been working at the Rannells with Clenton Owensby, professor of range management, for the past two years, and participated in his first burn this year.

prairie burning

STORY BY JENNIFER HOTCHKISS PHOTOS BY JUSTIN HAYWORTH

Ancient practice continues to preserve natural grassland

No one is sure how it started.

Many believe American Indians of the Great Plains were the first to notice bison were attracted to grasslands that had been burned in fires started by lightning.

After observing this phenomenon, the American Indians figured they could make the bison come to them by burning the grasslands around their reservations, said Clenton Owensby, professor of range management at K-State.

In the 1800s, the homesteaders who settled the plains copied the practice, Owensby said. They also discovered fire not only kept animals within a region, but the cattle looked better and were heavier if they grazed on range that had been burned.

Only a few parts of the country, including the Flint Hills of Kansas and Osage County of Oklahoma, continued to burn grass, said Terry Bidwell, professor of rangeland ecology and management at Oklahoma State University.

"Burns simply maintain a grassland," he said. "Without fire, grasslands would turn into forests."

Throughout the past month, many burns have been conducted around Manhattan to preserve the prairies and improve the quality of forage for livestock.

One of these prairies, the Rannells Flint Hills Prairie Preserve, located south of Manhattan on Kansas Highway 177, is maintained by Owensby and his students. Each April, Owensby and Lisa Auen, assistant scientist in agronomy at K-State, select a few students to help conduct the prairie burn.

"We only pick the best students to come out here and help conduct the burns," Owensby said. "It makes for a long, hard week. It's definitely not for everyone."

Canaan Ohlde, senior in agronomy, started working at the Rannells two years ago and conducted his first burn at the Rannells this spring.

"When I was younger, I learned how to burn pastures alongside my father at home," Ohlde said. "But last week was the first time I helped conduct a burn on a pasture as large as the Rannells."

Nearly 5,000 acres of pasture are burned annually at the Rannells. In 1989, the preserve was given to K-State under the strict guidelines that it be kept as rangeland for steer grazing research, Owensby said.

Burning the prairie at the Rannells is a great learning experience, Marc Johnson, senior in agronomy, said.

With plans to return to the family farm, Johnson said the lessons he is learning now will be useful in the future.

"It's rewarding to know that you conducted a successful and safe burn," Johnson said.

Ohlde said planning and lighting the fires is exciting.

"It can also be dangerous when the wind changes directions or speed," Johnson said. "I was a little worried this year when the wind changed speed one day. I thought the cedar trees surrounding one of the pastures were going to catch fire. Cedar trees burn fast and hot, so they would have been hard to control."

Fire is not something to attempt without training, Owensby said.

"You must have someone teach you or help you with the burn," he said. "You need to understand the principles behind it before you begin."

Poorly managed burns or ignorance of safety procedures can lead to building damage, and even injury or death.

When conducting a burn, you constantly need to be in guard, Ohlde said. The hardest part of the burn is deciding when and where to burn so it gets done safely.

"Burning prairies is a lot of fun, but after three or four days of inhaling smoke and battling hot flames, you're ready to be done," he said.

ABOVE: Heat rolls off a freshly set fire as Russ Smith, graduate student in agronomy, walks along spot burning part of the Rannells Flint Hills Prairie Preserve. Each year, the preserve is burned to allow the native prairie grass to grow back for the cattle to graze.

INSET: Fire spreads quickly through dry prairie grass, igniting all dry and dead plants and leaving only the green plants standing. This flower sags from stress after the intense heat of the fire.

BOTTOM RIGHT: Burning benefits the land by recycling nutrients trapped in old plant growth, increasing nutrition for the animals that graze on it. The Rannells Flint Hills Prairie Preserve is burned each year to improve forage production for the steer that graze the Rannells.

Man accused of murder in front of his son

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

OSKALOOSA, Kan. — A man accused of shooting his 14-year-old sister-in-law to death might have committed the crime in front of his 2-year-old son, jurors were told at the start of a murder trial.

Floyd Scott Bledsoe, 23, of Oskaloosa, went on trial Monday in Jefferson County District Court. Eight men and four women are hearing the case, in which Bledsoe is charged with first-degree murder, aggravated kidnapping and aggravated indecent liberties with a child.

Bledsoe is charged with killing Zetta "Camille" Arfmann. She had been living with Bledsoe, her sister, Heidi, and the couple's two children.

She disappeared after school Nov. 5 and was found dead three days later in a trash ditch.

Heidi Bledsoe, who is in the process of divorcing the defendant, testified that her son, Cody, described graphic details that led her to believe he witnessed the crime.

She said he first identified the killer as Floyd Bledsoe's older brother, Thomas, who initially was charged with the crime. Thomas confessed to the killing but later recanted and the charges against him were dropped.

Heidi Bledsoe quoted her son as saying, "Uncle Tom shot Aunt Mimi, bang, bang, bang."

"I think he said when she got shot, she fell down and shook," she said. "Now, he says Daddy shot Camille."

Heidi Bledsoe also said her husband treated Camille like a sister and cared for her.

But Rose Bolinger, a close friend of the victim, said Camille was afraid of the brother-in-law she had lived with for only a few months.

"He was always hitting on her and trying to get her to wrestle with him," Bolinger said. "She didn't like to be alone with him. She was not interested in boys as far as dating them and spending time. Some girls are boy crazy; Camille was not."

Jefferson County sheriff's Sgt. Robert Poppa testified that Camille was killed by a shot to the back of her head, and also had three bullet wounds to the chest. Investigators have determined those shots were fired after her death.

Poppa said tests showing whether the victim was sexually assaulted were negative, but there were minute traces of male bodily fluids found in her bed.

At the preliminary hearing, Thomas Bledsoe, 26, testified that he originally took the blame for the crime because his brother threatened to make public embarrassing incidents of a sexual nature.

He also had said Floyd Bledsoe told him he shot the girl after a sexual encounter went awry.

In his opening statement, defense attorney John Kurth said Thomas Bledsoe confessed to the crime on more than one occasion and owned the gun that was used in the killing.

He said Thomas Bledsoe's decision to pin the crime on his brother shouldn't be taken seriously.

Jefferson County Attorney Jim Vanderbilt told the jurors their job could be long and difficult.

"It's going to be easy to get emotional in this case," he said. "You're not going to hear any bad testimony about Zetta Camille; she was a good girl. She had her whole life ahead of her."

Vanderbilt also said there would be testimony that a hunter who was near the area where the body was found had heard a female voice crying for help.

Atlantis' lift-off delayed; NASA to try again today

By MARCIA DUNN
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla. — For the second day in a row, stiff winds prevented space shuttle Atlantis from lifting off Tuesday on a mission to fix the international space station.

Launch managers said they would try again this afternoon.

NASA is in a hurry to get Atlantis and its crew of seven to the space station. The station is slipping in orbit nearly two miles a week because of increased solar activity, and is down to four functioning batteries, close to the limit.

The astronauts will use the shuttle to boost the station as much as 27 miles and replace the batteries. They also will replace a broken antenna and fix a loose crane.

NASA called off the launch Tuesday with 40 minutes remaining in the countdown, as gale-force gusts of 39 mph swept the pad. That was well above the launch safety limit.

"We knew our chances were iffy with the winds today, but it was the right thing to do to try," commander James Halsell Jr. said.

The back-to-back delays cost NASA $1.2 million in shuttle fuel and overtime pay.

This will be the first time in 19 years of shuttle flight that NASA attempts a launch on three days in a row. The space agency usually limits the number of consecutive launch attempts to two to give the astronauts and launch team a rest.

NASA decided to go for three in a row this time, in part because of the convenient afternoon launch time and the fact that no shuttle problems have cropped up during the countdown, NASA spokesman Bruce Buckingham said.

THE ADVENTURE OF A LIFETIME BEGINS WITH AIR FORCE ROTC
Are you a:
- Freshman
- Sophomore
- Junior/Senior with 2 academic years to go starting fall semester
Air Force ROTC is an elective - but it's far more than that. Air Force ROTC is also a program that teaches you to be a leader, develops your management skills, and helps you grow into a well-rounded and self-assured person. For those who qualify, Air Force ROTC can even help pay for college through its scholarship program. When you graduate, you'll also become an Air Force officer doing exciting, meaningful things alongside other great people in fascinating places around the world. If you're interested, it's not too late to join. There's no obligation - as a matter of fact, you don't have to decide to join the military until your junior year. So go ahead, give it a try - you won't regret it.

Supreme Court hears case on Nebraska's partial-birth abortion ban

By RICHARD CARELLI
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — In the Supreme Court's most important abortion case since 1992, six of the nine justices voiced concern Tuesday over a Nebraska law, similar to those in 29 other states, banning a surgical procedure opponents call partial-birth abortion.

The emotional issue of abortion returned to the nation's highest court with noisy sidewalk demonstrations outside the courtroom hearing.

"The state interest here is drawing a bright line between abortion and infanticide," Nebraska Attorney General Don Stenberg argued in seeking reinstatement of a law that made it a crime for doctors to perform partial-birth abortions.

But Simon Heller, representing a Nebraska doctor, said none of the state's purported interests is sufficient to override a woman's interest in her health and bodily integrity.

The Nebraska law, he said, is "so broadly written it could prohibit most second-trimester abortions" and lead to making all abortions more dangerous for women.

Questions and comments from two key justices — Sandra Day O'Connor and Anthony M. Kennedy — indicated concern over the state law's sweep.

O'Connor said that the procedure Stenberg said was the target of Nebraska's ban might be similar to a type of abortion used far more often.

Partial-birth abortion is not a medical term. Doctors call the method dilation and extraction, or D&X, because it involves partially extracting a fetus, legs first, from the uterus into the birth canal, where the skull is cut and its contents drained.

A more common procedure is dilation and evacuation, or D&E, in which an arm or leg of a live fetus may be pulled into the birth canal during the abortion operation.

Calling both methods gruesome, O'Connor asked Stenberg, "Do you take the position that the state of Nebraska could also prohibit D&E abortions for pre-viability pregnancies?"

When Stenberg said he did not take that position for purposes of this case, O'Connor shot back, "It is difficult to read the statute and think that is so."

Justices David H. Souter, John Paul Stevens, Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Stephen G. Breyer seemed to doubt the Nebraska law's constitutionality.

Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist and Justice Antonin Scalia, who along with Justice Clarence Thomas voted in 1992 to let states ban all abortions, clearly were more sympathetic to the Nebraska law.

Scalia discussed the horror of D&X abortions, which he repeatedly described as taking a living, unborn child from the uterus and killing that unborn child.

The 1992 ruling — the court's most recent major abortion decision — reaffirmed the core holding of the court's 1973 Roe vs. Wade decision. That landmark ruling said women have a constitutional right to end their pregnancies.

Led by O'Connor, Kennedy and Souter, the court said eight years ago that states cannot impose any undue burden on that right.

Nebraska's law is not an undue burden, Stenberg said, no more than Pennsylvania's 24-hour waiting period to get an abortion, which the court approved in 1992.

But Ginsburg interrupted to say Nebraska's law — unlike the waiting period — is not aimed at protecting a woman's health or fetal life. "This law seems out of the bounds that this court has set for pre-viability regulation," she said.

Past abortion rulings make clear that states can take numerous steps to protect a viable fetus, one able to survive outside the uterus.

Viability generally occurs sometime around the sixth month of pregnancy.

Outside the court, anti-abortion and abortion-rights activists braved a driving rainstorm as they tried to outdo each other with signs and slogans.

Police arrested 23 anti-abortion demonstrators who ignored orders to remove signs that were larger than a federal regulation allows.

The court's decision is expected by late June, but the debate over partial-birth abortions already has played a role in presidential politics.

STORY BY CASSIDY HILL

Guitar player to perform jazz, blues tonight at Glenn's Music

Acoustic guitarist Richard Gilewitz will perform a variety of blues, jazz, classical and rock music at 7 tonight at Glenn's Music, on Poyntz Avenue.

Gilewitz, who originally is from Alabama, began writing and playing music for the acoustic guitar during the late 1970s.

His music was inspired by The Beatles and Andres Segovia, musicians featured on "The Dr. Demento Radio Show" and the "Midnight Special." While trying to earn his degree, Gilewitz played his acoustic guitar at a local coffeehouse in Alabama.

During the 1980s, he released an in-studio performance video titled "Somewhere In Between," along with an instructional song book titled "Voluntary Solitary."

Gilewitz released his third and most recent recording in 1997, "Synapse Collapse," which is a 13-track compact disc.

Some of the songs are from Bach, David Walbert and Leo Kottke, while the rest of the songs are Gilewitz's compositions.

Joe Meador, manager of Midwestern Music in Topeka, said he reviewed "Synapse Collapse." "Richard's new CD is a real neat one," Meador said.

"His music is real mellow and peaceful — he makes each note stand out."

Gilewitz will be performing at 2 p.m. May 6 at Midwestern Music.

Glenn Axelson, owner of Glenn's Music, said Gilewitz has played internationally and has performed in Manhattan before.

"Richard Gilewitz has performed his acoustic guitar all over the world," Axelson said. "He played at the BirdHouse here in Manhattan years ago."

Axelson also said Gilewitz's performance, which is free to the public, is going to be a fairly intimate presentation.

"I expect that Richard's performance will be informal, close and personal, since the audience will be sitting close to him," Axelson said.

"There is no charge to the public. However, anyone who will be attending needs to call Glenn's Music to request a chair, so that they have a place to sit during the concert. We are glad to let anyone in."

Seth Bate, committee chairman of the FNB Coffeehouse in Winfield, Kan., said he has interviewed Gilewitz and expects the concert to be great.

"I got the privilege of interviewing Richard Gilewitz," Bate said. "He is a real funny and devoted man, and I expect that his concert will astound his audience."

Because most people don't know Gilewitz by name, Bates said, the guitarist uses pure entertainment skills to capture his audience.

"I look for people who can hold the audience's attention, and I think that his performance will be very entertaining," Bates said.

"Many people around Kansas don't know the name of an acoustic guitarist when they pass through. I look for the entertainment value rather than the name."

'Whipped' to be shown at Union Forum Hall

■ Network Event Theater presents advance showing; Q&A with Dr. Drew to follow.

By NATALIA FARMER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

It's a story about friends falling in love with friends. It's a story about being "Whipped."

Network Event Theater will present an exclusive free advance screening of "Whipped" at 8 tonight in Forum Hall at the K-State Student Union.

"Whipped" is a comedy focusing on the life of Mia, played by Amanda Peet, who wins the love of three of her best friends.

The three men's lives change as they unfold their love for Peet's character, arguing why they should be the one to win her love.

Shane Brannan, public-relations coordinator for Network Event Theater, said the movie will be followed by a live interactive question-and-answer session with Dr. Drew from MTV's "Loveline."

"The theme of this movie is for a young audience, and he's really popular with the college kids," Brannan said.

"He's a talk-show host that covers issues such as teen sex and relationships in today's culture."

Mike Rottinghaus, UPC president, said "Whipped" is similar to the cult hit "Swingers," and he expects the movie to be a hit with students.

He said the interactive session with Dr. Drew will add to the experience of the screening.

"Dr. Drew answers the more serious questions on MTV," he said. "He'll be great for drawing people in for the movie."

Paul Donovan, UPC program adviser, said K-State is one of 40 schools nationwide with satellite technology that provides the ability of a live interactive question-and-answer session as well as an advance movie screening.

"We have had the technology since fall '97," he said.

"It started slow, because studios didn't trust the satellite at first, but with time they have gotten used to it and it's proving to be very useful."

Passes are required for the special screening of "Whipped."

They are available at the UPC office on the third floor of the Union or call 532-6571 for more information.

Helicopter crash kills 3 in Florida

By VICKIE CHACHERE
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

ST. PETERSBURG, Fla. — A medical evacuation helicopter crashed Tuesday on the marshy edge of Tampa Bay, killing the three crew members aboard, officials said.

No patients were aboard. The Baylite helicopter, which crashed shortly after noon, had just dropped off a patient at Bayfront Medical Center in St. Petersburg and was returning to its home base at St. Joseph's Hospital in Tampa.

Witnesses said the helicopter went down in pieces after clipping and toppling a 500-foot broadcast tower. But officials said they did not know if the helicopter already was in trouble when it hit the tower, or if clipping the tower caused the crash.

The weather was clear and visibility was good. No mechanical problem was reported, said Sue Brody, Bayfront's chief executive officer.

The helicopter crashed in the Snug Harbor-Weedon Island area of mangroves and canoe trails, north-east of St. Petersburg.

The victims were Alicia Betita Collins, 51, of Tampa, an Air Force flight nurse who also worked part time for Baylite; Baylite paramedic Eric Hangarter, 29, of Sarasota; and pilot Mark Wallace, 39, of Tampa.

The crews of local air ambulances mostly are made up of firefighters and paramedics who do duty as a part-time job.

Thomas Stubblefield, 31, a flight medic assigned to the helicopter that crashed, was on his day off when the phone rang and he was told his crew had gone down.

"You never know when is the last time you will see them," Stubblefield, a Clearwater firefighter said. "Everybody knows there is an element of danger, but you don't think about it."

Parsons tornado damaged 750 buildings, report says

Mobile homes needed for temporary housing.

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

PARSONS, Kan. — The people of Parsons knew last week's tornado hit hard. A report from the Kansas Adjutant General's Department shows just how hard.

A total of 750 buildings — 633 homes and 117 commercial buildings — were damaged in the storm that struck April 19.

The Adjutant General's report is not the only gauge of the tornado's strength.

A federal, state and local government team is assessing the damage to determine whether Parsons and rural Labette County will qualify for federal assistance.

City Manager Glen Welden said he did not expect a report from the team until next week.

The havoc in Parsons created opportunities for looters. Two looters were arrested Friday after they were captured and detained by residents.

Meanwhile, the police department has its own storm-related problems.

It lost a building and is using the Labette County Sheriff's Department for communications.

The department also lost four police cars, but has obtained two replacements.

In addition, the department lost an emergency response vehicle but hopes to replace it with military surplus.

The mess of last week's tornado slowly is being transported from Parsons' streets and neighborhoods to the landfill south of town.

Parsons officials estimated that 40 dump trucks had made thousands of trips to the landfill. City parks superintendent Mark Flynn said the process will continue for weeks.

The streets in the most seriously damaged part of town will not reopen until buildings either have been razed or repaired, said Keith Stammer, a liaison between the city, county and state.

The day after the tornado, 15 cities sent 34 dump trucks and drivers to supplement Parsons' six trucks.

It was one of the most valuable contributions that could be made, Flynn said.

Stammer said preliminary numbers appear to show the tornado caused well above the threshold of damage needed for federal assistance.

That is important, he said, because the Federal Emergency Management Administration provides money to homeowners, businesses, the city and local and state governments to aid in disaster recovery.

Needed right now are mobile homes and other types of temporary housing, state Rep. Gené O'Brien, D-Parsons said.

Bob Wood, a partner in Wood-Dulohery Insurance Inc., is the city's and county's insurance agent. He said it is imperative that an adequate answer to temporary housing be found quickly.

"It's key we don't turn into a 9,000-person town because of this," he said. "We need to stay a 12,000-person community."

While many were concerned with the big picture, others were trying to help people deal with smaller and sometimes irreplaceable losses, such as pictures and family heirlooms.

Linda Proehl, assistant superintendent of the Parsons School District USD 503, said anyone finding an unclaimed or unmarked item can take it to the school district office.

"We're trying to help out people with things that cannot be replaced," Proehl said. The school district will show the lost items on damage report

A report from the Kansas Adjutant General's Department lists the tornado damage in Parsons, Kan., on April 19. The report also said 27 Kansas Army National Guard soldiers will stay through today to remove debris.

■ 53 homes and 20 commercial buildings were destroyed.

■ 112 homes and 28 commercial buildings received major damage.

■ 468 homes and 89 commercial buildings sustained slight damage.

Vermont recognizes gay marriages

By ROSS SNEYD
The Associated Press

MONTPELIER, Vt. — Vermont lawmakers gave final approval Tuesday to a bill that would make the state the first in the nation to give gay and lesbian couples the benefits of marriage.

Gov. Howard Dean has promised to sign the bill and might do so by the end of the week. The first civil unions ceremonies could take place after July 1.

The final House vote on accepting Senate amendments was 79-68.

"The granting of the equal protections of the law by providing the legal protections, benefits and responsibilities that flow from marriage will not diminish your humanity, your dignity, your freedom or independence," House Judiciary Committee Chairman Thomas Little said.

"The continued denial of these legal protections, benefits and responsibilities to a small but vulnerable class of Vermont's citizens diminishes their humanity, dignity, freedom and independence."

Opponents made one last attempt to derail the bill before the final vote. A Republican representative proposed delaying the vote until Nov. 30, after the fall elections, but the move was defeated, 84-63.

The bill would create civil unions as a legal framework parallel to marriage.

Same-sex couples would be able to go to their town clerk to obtain a civil union license, just as opposite-sex couples obtain marriage licenses.

The civil unions then would be certified by a justice of the peace, judge or member of the clergy, just as marriages.

Breakups between civil-union partners would be handled like divorces, through Family Court, although they would be called dissolutions.

Civil-union partners would gain all of the benefits that the state confers through marriage, such as making medical decisions on behalf of partners or inheritance.

The state action, however, has no effect on federal programs, such as Social Security.

The biggest Senate change the House had to accept was moving up the date when the first civil unions could be formed to July 1 instead of two months later under the original House measure. Other Senate amendments dealt largely with language and did not change the substance of the bill.

After the Hawaii Supreme Court raised the possibility of same-sex marriages in 1993 — a prospect the state's voters later rejected — 30 states and the federal government passed laws denying recognition to same-sex marriages.

Family sues police for shooting

The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Kan. — Law officers who smashed their way into an eastern Kansas home and fatally shot an occupant during a drug raid had the wrong house, the victim's family alleges in a lawsuit.

Willie Heard, 46, was shot to death about 1:25 a.m. on Feb. 13, 1999, just seconds after police and sheriff's officers crashed through the door of his Osawatomie home. His wife and 16-year-old daughter witnessed the shooting.

In their lawsuit, filed Friday in U.S. District Court, the survivors seek unspecified damages from the Miami County Board of Commissioners, the county sheriff, the cities of Osawatomie and Paola and their police chiefs, and six individual officers.

The lawsuit alleges that the no-knock drug raid was based on faulty information and occurred at the wrong house.

Officers neither announced themselves nor ordered Heard to drop a rifle — later found to be unloaded — before shooting him in a bedroom, the family contends.

On a law-enforcement videotape that captured the raid but not the shooting, the victim can be heard asking for help and declaring his innocence after being shot once in the chest. He died a short time later.

No officers were disciplined as a result of the shooting. Following an investigation by the Kansas Bureau of Investigation, Miami County Attorney David Miller ruled that the participating officers had committed no crimes.

According to the lawsuit, the officers detonated what was described as a "flash-bang" device before breaking through the front door of the house. Sixteen-year-old Ashley Heard then ran screaming for her father. Eleven seconds later, he was shot, the lawsuit alleges.

After the shooting, Ashley and her mother, Linda Heard, were arrested and taken to police headquarters, according to the complaint. They were not charged.

The complaint said 26 officers from the Miami County Sheriff's Department and the Paola and Osawatomie police departments participated in the raid.

The complaint said the officers gave a judge false and misleading information to obtain a warrant to search for cocaine.

The warrant did not authorize the officers to enter without knocking, and no cocaine was found, the lawsuit says.

The complaint quotes a police report as saying that a "trace amount of green vegetation residue," presumably marijuana, was found but not collected because there wasn't enough to test.

The search was based on information that was contradictory and never thoroughly checked out, the complaint says. That information included allegations that police had seen drug sales on the street near the Heard house.

Authorities suspected that a relative of Heard who lived in the same block was selling drugs, the suit says.

An Osawatomie police officer, who claimed he had been in the house where drugs were sold, drew the floor plan for the raid, but it turned out to be the floor plan of another house, the complaint says.

Kansas Legislature allots salary increase to faculty

By ANGELA KISTNER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State's fight for increased faculty salaries was successful when the Kansas Legislature allocated a 5.9-percent salary increase for the 2000-01 academic year pending approval this week.

However, the success is minimal. Only ranked faculty — instructors, assistant professors, associate professors and full professors — will receive the 5.9-percent increase while other unclassified professionals — such as advisers, physicians, computing technologists and librarians — only will receive a 2.5-percent increase.

Unclassified employees are unhappy about this two-tiered system.

"You don't want a two-tiered system," said Gretchen Holden, chair of the Faculty Senate Administrative Caucus and director of Education and Personal Development. "You don't want to create division and jealousies."

"That isn't good for the climate here."

Holden said the difference in salary increases conveys the message that the unclassified professionals are less important to the university.

"It says we're second-class citizens and that we're not really important to what's going on on campus," she said.

Faculty Senate president Marion Gray said he and administrators understand the concerns of the unclassified employees.

"They're real important to the university," he said. "Without them, we couldn't function."

Gray said this issue began last year when the Kansas Board of Regents began working on bringing regent schools' faculty salaries to their peer levels. The data presented to the Legislature about the gap in salaries between regent universities and peer universities was only for ranked faculty, resulting in the differences between the salary increases.

For the 1999-2000 academic year, the difference in salary increases was small — a 1.4-percent difference opposed to the 3.4-percent difference for next year — so people didn't notice as much, Gray said.

"Everybody should have been a little quicker to notice," he said.

Besides creating a division between ranked faculty and other unclassified employees, Gray said the salary increase difference creates another problem. While the salary increase is supposed to help move faculty salaries closer to the national average, it also is supposed to address other salary problems such as salary compression and gender and ethnic salary inequities.

Gray explained salary compression as, "The longer you are in your job, the lower your salary is in relation to peers."

He said much of the available money goes to hire new people, which costs money for the search and for the salary. Compared to other National Association of State Universities and Land Grant Colleges, K-State's new instructors actually make an average of 1.9 percent more.

However, as the instructors move through the ranks over the years to a full professor, they fall behind an average of 24.4 percent in salaries, compared to NASULGC institutions.

Part of the salary increase will help get these professors' salaries closer to the NASULGC institutions.

However, because unclassified professionals are getting a smaller salary increase than ranked faculty, Gray said it will be hard to address the salary compression and gender and ethnic inequities among those employees.

Kansas Board of Regents executive director Kim Wilcox said the issue of a two-tiered salary increase has been a concern of the regents for the past two years.

He said the regents always have requested the same increase for fac-

Serving for FREEDOM

STORY BY JENN DAVOREN

LEFT: Gen. Richard Myers said preserving the gift of freedom received from those who served before is the most important reason for serving the country. "We need to continue caring for our greatest treasure — our people," he said.

Four-star general delivers 118th Landon Lecture

Gen. Richard Myers didn't allow a lecture podium to hinder his delivery of the 118th Landon Lecture on Wednesday morning.

Instead, the vice chairman of the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff delivered most of his speech at the edge of the McCain Auditorium stage, allowing him to address his audience directly.

The title of Myers' speech, "Why We Serve," was explored by the four-star general as he spoke to veterans of military service seated in the auditorium. Myers took a count of those in the crowd who had served in past wars, such as a Lawrence woman sent to Europe through voluntary service during World War II, and those who soon would determine the future of the U.S. military, such as a K-State student preparing himself for flight training in Alabama after graduation.

After personally thanking those who had served in conflicts involving U.S. troops, Myers explained military service as a necessity for the preservation of the American people's way of life.

"We serve to preserve the gift of freedom we received from those who served before us," he said. "As an institution, we need to continue caring for our greatest treasure: our people."

Continued defense of a country is the duty of all who dwell there, Myers said, either through military service or the support of those who choose to serve.

"The Constitution gives us freedoms but entrusts us with certain responsibilities," he said.

Modernization of the military was another topic Myers discussed, as technological advances make practices such as biological warfare and cyberwarfare more common. Better equipping military men and women involved in conflicts abroad is a constant challenge, Myers said, but is one the U.S. Armed Forces will continue to address until a solution can be found.

"The last thing we want to do is send people overseas with the second-best equipment," Myers said. "When we see a problem, we fix it."

The general also addressed such issues as the low salary those who serve in the armed forces receive, and improving upon it in order to draw a larger list of recruits.

"The last defense bill gave us the largest pay raise we've ever had," Myers said. "We're basically working on increasing the quality of life."

Kenneth Cosgriff, a member of K-State's Army ROTC and senior in biology, said he enjoyed Myers' speech due to his exploration of military issues to come.

"I thought his speech was pertinent. He talked

Myers, vice chairman of the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff, used the remainder of that time meeting with students, faculty and community members.

The decision of who gets to meet with Landon speakers and what they do before and after their stints at the podium falls into the hands of Charles Reagan, chairman of the Landon Lecture Series and assistant to President Jon Wefald.

Reagan said he tries to find people who have an interest in the speaker's field to meet with the lecturers.

Lucky BrewGrille faces license loss, $12,000 in fines

By ANGELA KISTNER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The popular Aggieville bar Lucky BrewGrille could get its liquor license revoked if an appeal isn't successful.

The establishment had 14 counts of violating the Club and Drinking Establishment Act by allegedly allowing minors in possession on its premises. The Alcohol Beverage Control revoked Lucky BrewGrille's license and fined it $12,400.

Scott Holeman, communications director of the Kansas Department of Revenue ABC division, said a liquor license can be revoked after nine offenses.

"A violation is if you sell, give or furnish alcohol to a minor or permit consumption or possession by a minor," he said.

Holeman said once a liquor establishment loses a license, the liquor licensee can't operate with a license in Kansas anymore.

According to a lawsuit filed April 13, Robert Leetch, owner of Lucky BrewGrille, requested that the court set a trial and the fine and suspension be set aside.

The lawsuit further stated that Leetch was appealing the suspension and revocation because most of the minors used fake IDs, he didn't voluntarily or involuntarily allow the alleged minors to possess alcohol on his premises and that there is no evidence to support the alleged violations.

Oleen announces bid for re-election

By CRISTINA JANNEY
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Sen. Lana Oleen, R-Manhattan, announced Wednesday she would run for re-election.

Oleen is seeking her fourth term in the Legislature.

She touts as some of the recent legislative successes for the Manhattan area an enrollment adjustment for Manhattan-Ogden USD 383, establishment of a veteran's cemetery system, work orders for rehabilitation of the Territorial Capitol at Fort Riley and economic development initiatives.

Oleen said upcoming challenges for the Legislature will be reapportionment, a possible rewrite of the school finance formula and accountability in government spending.

Instead of creating new taxes, she said she would work to create more taxpayers by attracting and retaining new private sector jobs.

Oleen leads the Senate Federal and State Affairs Committee and the Legislative Post Audit Committee. She serves as a member of the Senate Education, Judiciary, Corrections/Juvenile Justice Oversight, Higher Education and Confirmations committees. She recently was elected president of the Women's Legislative Network at the national level.

Oleen said she chose to announce her candidacy Wednesday because it was her birthday.

Melee in Texas prison with 300 inmates leaves 1 dead

LAMESA, Texas — A West Texas prison was under lockdown Wednesday in the aftermath of a melee between 300 black and Hispanic inmates, some wielding garden tools. One inmate was killed and 31 were injured.

The disturbance at the minimum- to medium-security Smith Unit began around 6:30 p.m. Tuesday and was under control by midnight, said John Barton, spokesman for Warden Lupe Lozano.

State prison officials said it took about 300 guards to quell the disturbance, which centered in the prison's recreation yard. A kitchen was gutted by fire, Fitzgerald said.

"You're looking at one-on-one instead of 10-on-one in this kind of situation," Barton said of the number of guards.

Fighting began after an incident in a chow hall between two inmates, said Larry Fitzgerald, a spokesman for the Texas Department of Criminal Justice in Huntsville.

Authorities said the dispute appeared to be racial. A Hispanic inmate confronted a black inmate who was fondling himself in front of a female officer, Fitzgerald said.

"It started off with a small group fighting, and the guards got that under control. Then another group got into one, and the fight got bigger and bigger until it got to the point of a mass riot," Barton said.

Guards used a pepper-like spray to subdue the inmates in the prison 60 miles south of Lubbock. One guard suffered minor injuries from a gas grenade that went off in his hand.

The inmate killed Tuesday was identified as Fernando Trejo, 20, convicted of burglary. Barton said some of the injuries were critical.

The riot came as the Texas Department of Criminal Justice was investigating guards' complaints about understaffing in the prison system. The Smith Unit prison was designed to hold 1,276 but houses 1,322 prisoners, Barton said.

However, officials said today that staffing was not a problem Tuesday, that the dining area was staffed properly when the fighting started and that staffing had been beefed up last fall.

"We are short 30 officers of the 422 authorized," corrections department spokesman Larry Todd said in Austin. "That spread over three shifts is not a significant shortage. In addition there are sergeants and lieutenants on duty."

Kansas Open Records Act bill now under negotiation

TOPEKA — Legislation adding penalties for violating the Kansas Open Records Act went to House and Senate negotiators Wednesday, and its handler said the bill should find its way to Gov. Bill Graves.

The Senate-passed bill would impose fines of up to $500 on state and local government agencies that knowingly violate the Open Records Act.

Each local government agency also would have to designate an employee as its freedom of information officer, to handle requests and decide which records are open to the public.

The House version was loaded with so many amendments that it was dead on arrival to the Senate, which crafted the simpler version. Some House amendments did more to restrict access than guarantee it.

"We would like to take a look at the new version and discuss it with the senators," said House Local Government Chairman Carlos Mayans, R-Wichita.

Mayans wants Senate negotiators to restore a provision to eliminate all 44 exemptions to the Open Records Act on July 1, 2005, unless the Legislature votes to save them.

The Senate eliminated one exemption that allows officials to close to the public lists of bidders on government construction projects before those contracts are awarded. Those records typically remain open.

But Mayans said even if the exemptions aren't restored, he still thinks the bill will go to the governor.

Originally, the bill was proposed by Graves and Attorney General Carla Stovall, who proposed creating a single freedom of information officer in the attorney general's office.

Graves said he still prefers having a single freedom of information officer in the attorney general's office, but lacking that won't stop him from signing the bill.

TAKE note

Helms watchdog. Sen. Jesse Helms pledged in Washington, D.C., Wednesday to block any arms-control agreement that President Clinton might negotiate with Russia in the closing months of his term.

"Not on my watch, Mr. President. It's not going to happen," Helms, R-N.C., who chairs the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, said in a Senate speech.

Helms said he is fearful Clinton wants to conclude an arms-reduction agreement with Moscow as part of his legacy as president.

"In a few months, the American people will go to the polls to elect a new president—a president who must have a clean break from the failed policies of this administration," Helms said. "He must have the freedom and the flexibility to establish his own security policies."

The Clinton administration wants to amend the landmark 1972 Anti-Ballistic Missile treaty to build a limited missile-defense system. Moscow vehemently has opposed the plan.

However, the recent approval by Russian legislators of two arms-control accords helped fuel optimism in the administration for a new round of talks.

Helms told the Senate, "It is my intent to do everything in my power to ensure that nothing is done in the next few months by this administration to tie the hands of the next administration in pursuing a new national security policy."

In particular, Helms said his panel would not have hearings or consider in any way any renegotiated ABM treaty.

"Let's be clear to avoid any misunderstanding down the line. Any modified ABM treaty negotiated by this administration will be DOA, dead on arrival, at the Senate Foreign Relations Committee," Helms said.

Helms long has considered the ABM treaty null and void anyway, on grounds that it was negotiated with the Soviet Union, which no longer exists. It is a view shared by many conservatives, but not by the administration or most arms-control analysts.

Helms has tied up treaties before. He bottled up the Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty for years before the Senate finally took it up last fall—and rejected it.

Separately, Defense Secretary William Cohen told the Senate Appropriations Committee that he still intends to make a recommendation this summer to Clinton on whether to proceed with deployment of a national missile defense.

As for the ABM treaty, Cohen said the administration still intends to negotiate with the Russians "and see whether or not we can amend the ABM treaty to take into account a national missile defense if the president should choose to go forward."

High school students to walk Saturday for education programs

By NANCY FOSTER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

About 50 high school students from Topeka and Salina will participate in a six mile walk-a-thon at 9:30 a.m. Saturday at Anneberg Park in order to raise money for education.

The students, along with many others, are participating in the walk for Education Advancement to raise money for the K-State Upward Bound Math and Science program. The federally funded program is designed to provide educational opportunities for students who come from economically or educationally disadvantaged backgrounds.

The UBMS program chooses 50 students from the Topeka and Salina area who meet its criteria. In order to qualify, the student must show an interest in pursuing a math or science degree, have at least a 2.5 grade point average and come from a low-income or be the first family member with post-secondary education plans.

NaTashua Davis, student services coordinator, said the students participating have been going door-to-door asking for donations since late February.

"It looks like it's going really well," she said. "The kids all have a goal of raising $100 apiece, and they are really excited about it."

After the walk, there will be a picnic and a raffle. A shelftop stereo, gift certificates to local restaurants and a football signed by K-State head football coach Bill Snyder, former player Veryl Switzer and various K-State football players all will be given away.

All proceeds from the walk-a-thon and raffle tickets will go toward UBMS research, scholarship programs and educational field trips.

Davis said the organization needs money to be able to get the students involved with people in both science and math fields.

"We would like to get them involved with science professors, and we need money to do that," she said. "We want to get them involved with people in the field so they can decide if being a math or science major is really for them."

She said everyone involved with the event was excited, especially the children.

"They are really excited to enhance our program, because that's what this extra money will go towards," she said.

Lynne Davy, assistant director, said the organization has done the walk-a-thon one other time, but not to the extent of this year's.

"The students have a wonderful time," she said. "They have a good time raising money for their program."

Davis said one of the organization's goals is to help its members pursue secondary education, and one way they do this is with the educational field trips.

"We try to expose them to other colleges and take them to campuses in other states," she said. "We really expose them to culture and education that they wouldn't normally get to experience. We have a lot of kids that have not experienced their community or even been outside of Kansas."

She said on the trips they take, they not only look at colleges, but they attend plays and visit museums.

"We try to expose them to new and different things they haven't been exposed to," she said.

"We really expose them to culture and education that they wouldn't normally get to experience. We have a lot of kids that have not experienced their community or even been outside of Kansas."

Elementary students perform opera they created: 'The Piper's Path'

Her eyes are closed. She sits with white baby's breath in her hair, which is pulled in a bun. A lavender silk dress accessorized with hunter green lace is surrounding her.

Lecrecia McCauley, a fourth grader, portrays Princess Gwendolyn in "The Piper's Path." She is just one of the students in the Broadway Beginners Opera Company of Roosevelt School.

The original student-created opera opened Tuesday. The final performance of "The Piper's Path" will be tonight. The opera revolves around a princess trying to free innocent villagers from prison.

Prior to the Wednesday evening show, Lecrecia said she was anxious about the performance.

"I'm nervous about singing, because my voice shakes," Lecrecia said.

Yet that nervousness is subsided when her character's position of power comes into play.

"Everybody has to hail me," Lecrecia said. "They have to be nice to me."

Roger Gibson, teacher at Roosevelt, collaborated with Susanna Parker, music teacher at Roosevelt, to help the sixth-annual performance come together.

Gibson said the children put a lot of hard work into creating the songs, originating the lyrics, developing the script, designing the sets and picking out costumes.

He said there would be at least one thing that the show would generate.

"I think there will be a lot of proud parents and grandparents," Gibson said.

Greeting guests for the performance was Ming Lee, fifth grader in charge of public relations. Ming was in charge of creating the program, Ming said the opera has helped him overcome a fear of his.

"When I was little, I was really shy," Ming said. "And now I am not as shy. I am not as anti-social."

Lecrecia and Ming agreed Scene 2 was their favorite because a live animal is added to the group of props.

"I like Scene 2 because they have a rat in it. I really like rats," Ming said. "But I don't like mice for some reason."

When preparing for the performance, Ming said the funniest thing that happened involved the rat.

"One time, the rat had a bathroom break during the performance," he said. "Even Mr. Gibson and Mrs. Parker laughed then."

Not everyone in the audience attended the performance just to watch their children or grandchildren. Mukta Pahwa doesn't have any children in the opera, but she laughed and clapped with other members of the crowd.

"I have two sons who have graduated from this school," Pahwa said. "This is the first year they are not in it."

Pahwa said the school always invites the families of those who have performed in previous shows.

"When your kids are in it, you see how many hours of practice they put into it. They have so much fun, and it is such a wonderful experience," Pahwa said. "Even though my kids aren't in it, it is the same feeling."

After the performance, the actors and actresses met in the hall to celebrate their show.

Hannah Clark, fifth grader who portrayed Moliva, said she was proud of everyone after the Wednesday night performance.

"I thought we did really good," Hannah said. "It was the best we've ever done."

Landon Lectures need student involvement

Landon Lectures need to be for the students.

Sure, students are invited to attend the lectures. But that is where student involvement comes screeching to a halt.

When lecturers travel to K-State, their days are planned in detail. They eat meals with members of the administration, visit with Landon Lecture patrons and occasionally make a brief appearance in a department relevant to their field of employment.

Little, if any, time is devoted to students.

Wednesday's appearance by Gen.

Richard Myers illustrates that point. He spent the day in the presence of President Jon Wefald, Manhattan Mercury editor Ed Seaton and several donors to the lecture series.

He began with a Tuesday-night dinner at which no students were in attendance.

Breakfast also focused on donors and administration.

Other than lunch with Student Body President Jake Worcester and Senate Chair Travis Lenkner, student contact on a personal level practically was nonexistent.

This approach is ludicrous.

Without a doubt, those who donated money to bring speakers here should have an opportunity to meet with those speakers. Otherwise, they will not continue to give money.

Administration also will continue to meet with speakers. But planners must devise a way to wedge interaction with students into the day.

Myers, the highest-ranking Air Force official in the nation, only had time for a brief photo op with members of K-State's ROTC. He did find time to meet with engineering students, a strange occurrence for a lecturer.

This was a step up from previous lecturer Bob Woodward, whose lunch with journalism faculty included only one student.

Obviously students are the reason these lecturers are being invited.

Students are the reason tens of thousands dollars is being spent per speaker.

Perhaps it's time to get the most for that money and include students in the festivities.

Nice paper yesterday, Collegian.

Why does Moore Hall have to be so anal about water guns?

Let's give it up for Olga making it in the first round of the WNBA draft.

I think they should change the name of the Landon Lecture to the Old White Man Lecture.

Did Title IX ban us from running a sports section?

Looks like our football tickets are going to go up another couple cents since we had to use a "Get Out of Jail Free" card for Jarrod Cooper.

I wanted to know, can you get season equestrian tickets on KATS?

Thanks to Cooper, we are now one step closer to the Nebraska football program.

I got two words for you: Fire Roney.

I'm kind of excited about the whole equestrian women's team because it will give me something to bet on for the horse races.

I heard this rumor that Asbury was going to be the new stable boy for the equestrian team.

Equestrian? Max Urlick must be high.

Hey, Royal Purple, thank you for putting the streaker from Homecoming in there. We really enjoyed it.

Max Urlick, that has got to be one of the stupidest decisions I have ever seen. Women's equestrian is not going to work.

Isn't it nice that the president's campaign manager got elected Student Senate chair? I'm surprised the president's girlfriend didn't get appointed attorney general, too.

Who put the color-blind geek with no taste in charge of designing the yearbook cover?

I love our retro-looking yearbook. They're fly.

I can't wait until the Ackert addition is completed. Then there won't be any open space left on campus.

The only good thing to come out of the independent community is ... well ... I'll get back to you on that one.

Equestrian smart pick for school's new sport

Editor,

I would like to address the issue of the new varsity equestrian team.

I think it was an appropriate choice, especially since K-State is an agricultural school.

This is a new sport to many people and colleges, so I think our team should be given a chance.

While many don't think this takes athletic ability, it does. Being a participant all of my life, I can tell you it takes more athletic ability than any of you know — especially when you go to a meet and get on a horse you don't know anything about and don't even have a chance to get used to.

As one of my team members said in her letter Tuesday, I also challenge you to come to one of our practices, get on one of the horses and practice with us. We would welcome the opportunity to teach others about our sport and the athletic ability it involves.

Tobacco industry deception 1 of several reasons not to fall victim to cigarettes

I am against people smoking cigarettes.

I am not against people smoking cigarettes because it is bad for them and it is one of the leading causes of cancer and heart disease and leads to premature death.

Personally, I could not give a rat's ass about other people's health. I do not smoke primarily because of the health risks. I would not want my children to smoke due to the health risks, and I definitely would not like to see any of my good friends and family suffering due to a life of smoking.

But strangers can do what they want. Everybody knows they put their health at risk by smoking cigarettes. It says on every pack of cigarettes that this product will kill you. If strangers choose to smoke tobacco and kill themselves prematurely, I hope they enjoyed life in the meantime (actually, because they are strangers, I really couldn't care less if they enjoyed their lives or not).

In fact, it probably is better for society as a whole that people in this country die sooner rather than later. On average, a person collects everything they put into Social Security within the first three years of retirement. All the money received after that is just gravy. If a person retires at 65 and lives to 85, that is 17 years of free government money. I am not saying they do not deserve to collect Social Security for all those years. It is just that with Social Security in trouble, it would be better for retirees to die at 66 than 100 (except for my parents and grandparents, of course).

Moreover, the health-care costs will be about the same, or less, if a person dies from the effects of smoking in their 60s than from other causes in their 90s. One either spends thousands of dollars on chemotherapy right away and then dies, or spends thousands of dollars over many years for prescriptive drugs and the replacement hip and then undergoes chemotherapy and dies.

The real reason I am against smoking cigarettes is because the people who run the industry are a bunch of sons of bitches. For years, the tobacco industry knew its product not only posed a health risk but also was addictive. Yet they lied through their teeth and said neither was true, even under sworn testimony in front of Congress.

Moreover, the tobacco industry intentionally manipulates the nicotine in cigarettes to make them more addictive. This way, not only will the consumer buy more of their lethal product, but they also will find it more difficult to quit.

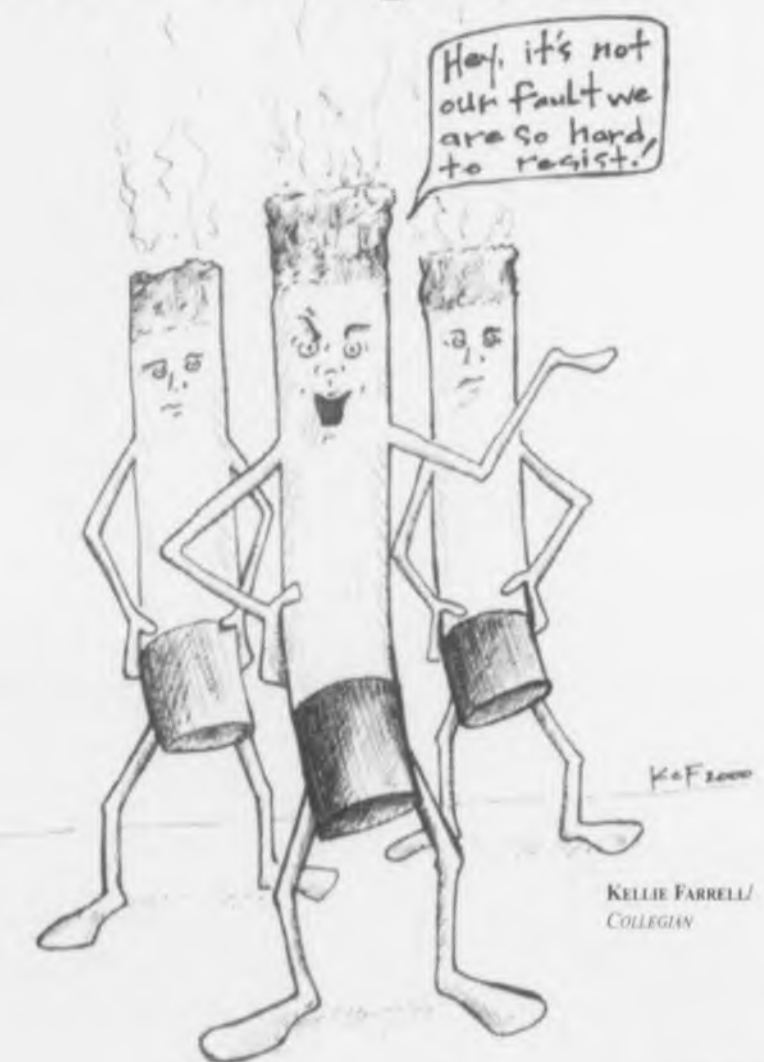

The true nasty nature of the tobacco industry became apparent when it tried to silence company whistle-blowers and the news media from letting the rest of the world know what it already suspected — that the tobacco industry knew cigarettes are a health risk and addictive and manipulated the nicotine to make its product more addictive.

The tobacco industry publicly sued whistle-blowers into poverty, not because the tobacco industry won its cases, but just in legal costs.

Privately, the representatives of the tobacco industry sent death threats to some of these whistle-blowers as Daniel Schorr reported in "Smoke in the Eye" for PBS's "Frontline."

To the news media, the tobacco industry successfully silenced both ABC's "Day One" and CBS's "60 Minutes" by threatening them with multimillion-dollar law suits. It was only after The New York Times showed guts and printed a story about what the tobacco industry knew and when they knew it that "60 Minutes" finally aired its news story.

A personal reason I'm against the tobacco industry is because it is one of the largest campaign contributors to ultra-conservative politicians, including Sen. Jesse Helms and Rep. Bob Barr. It is beyond me that my liberal friends who support all those liberal causes will give so much money to an industry that gives so much of its money to support conservative candidates who work against such causes.

KELLIE FARRELL/
COLLEGIAN

Actually, I'm not against all people who want to smoke; I'm against smoking only when liberal people do. Those with conservative ideologies can smoke all they like. In fact, I highly encourage it.

Because senior citizens are the only ones who vote, if we can kill off all the conservatives by the time they become old, thus leaving only us liberals, maybe then we can repeal all these restrictive clothing laws and finally be able to run naked in the streets.

Local government needs to key-in on community needs

Our local government looks more and more each day like our government in Washington, D.C. — completely out of touch with the needs of our community.

I'm talking about the approval given by our local government to the Grand Mere project.

This project is a 20-year development plan of the land surrounding Colbert Hills Golf Course to create a luxury-home, self-sufficient community.

However exciting it would be for Manhattan to look like Hilton Head, S.C., the plan misses the greatest needs in the community while creating problems of its own.

Our community needs low-cost, single-family housing, businesses that pay at least a living wage and enough vision to preserve our environment.

The need for decent housing in Manhattan never has been greater. Housing prices reflect the presence of K-State and its students. Landlords are able to raise rent prices because students have the ability to pay. A three-bedroom rental is priced between $600 and $800 a month.

While students can afford splitting the rent, for a typical Manhattan family, this rental price is unbearable. When one considers clothing and food for a family of five, not to mention bills and insurance, these families barely are getting by. Grand Mere housing will be completely out of reach for a family making less than $30,000 a year.

While Grand Mere's developers never have claimed it to be the solution to the city's housing problems, too much time and effort will be placed in its development to even consider alternatives to the existing issues.

Another issue facing our city is a lack of jobs outside the university and the Kansas Farm Bureau that pay a living wage. Many of my friends who are graduating would love to stay in Manhattan, but there aren't any jobs that would meet their needs.

Grand Mere includes new jobs. However, these jobs are service level, including convenience stores and gift shops.

At minimum wage, or even a dollar higher, these jobs are not the type of jobs for which the city needs to plan.

We need industry and professional businesses that are assets to our community. These large businesses would add to the tax base and provide jobs that meet the needs of the city's residents.

Finally, the city should have the vision to endorse only developments that preserve our environment.

Colbert Hills Golf Course has done a tremendous job of conserving and protecting the land. In planning and developing the course, officials were careful to preserve our natural grassland ecosystem.

The golf course meets strict environmental regulations for erosion protection and water-quality standards to have approval of noted environmental agencies.

The Grand Mere development has not made such strict and Earth-friendly plans. While Colbert Hills has tried, if the development of Grand Mere does not consider these issues, Colbert Hills' efforts will have been in vain.

Grand Mere, while an exciting addition to Colbert Hills, is not the solution that the city of Manhattan is looking for to provide affordable housing, jobs that provide a living wage, and vision to preserve our environment.

While our city focuses on the new growth and prosperity this type of development promises, we lose time in finding solutions to our basic problems.

There were many different reasons the equestrian team was chosen, only one of which was a financial concern. For example, the equestrian team will be able to offer more females the chance to participate than such sports as soccer and softball.

Although our team is an addition to K-State, it has accomplished many goals for being so small. Despite having to compete with schools such as Oklahoma State and Texas A&M — which have much larger teams — we have proven to be competitive.

In the future, I would like to see other sports such as softball and soccer added to the roster of NCAA sports. I again would like to invite anyone with or without experience who likes a challenge and likes horses to come and join our team.

Drunk driving offenses need strict punishments

Editor,

If I were keeping copies of all the ridiculous letters written to the Collegian, the one by Stacy Groth and 14 others about DUIs would rank near the top.

Her letter actually covers two different topics — revocation of license for first DUI and the imprecise nature of the Breathalyzer (or kazoo, as she so eloquently put it). I will begin with the first topic.

Groth, what kind of life have you been living that you do not understand the seriousness of driving while intoxicated? Have you been locked in a closet somewhere and not heard about how many people are killed by drunk drivers each day? Well, let me be the one to open that door for you.

In 1998, there were 174 people killed in Kansas alone due to alcohol-related accidents. Nationwide, there were 15,935 people killed in alcohol-related accidents — an average of one person every 33 minutes. The majority of these fatalities are caused by people with no prior DUI convictions.

For you to say a DUI is a petty offense is an insult to those who have been killed or injured. You said the legal punishments for DUIs are ridiculous. Well, what do you propose the punishment be? You went on to say part of the problem is there are no chances available for redemption of one's mistake. Guess what? If you are killed by a drunk driver or kill someone because you are intoxicated, there are no chances for redemption in that case, either.

The bottom line is you need to realize the seriousness of a DUI. It is not just a passing mistake that should be forgotten. It shows a severe lack of judgment and responsibility on the part of the driver. In my opinion, those people do not need to be behind the wheel of a car until they are mature enough to handle it.

In the second half of her letter, Groth complains about the inaccuracy of the Breathalyzer. Her first argument is there are chemicals that might cause sober people to set off the Breathalyzer. If you happen to be in the rare position of being pulled over and testing positive on the Breathalyzer due to some other condition, simply let them know and insist they take you to the hospital for a blood test.

The second argument is that most of the alcohol distributes itself in the lower two-thirds of your lungs so "the harder you blow, the higher you go." She says this logic is sheer stupidity. Well, I submit it is sheer stupidity to be driving after you have been drinking so stop trying to make excuses. Do yourself (and us) a favor and grow up now.

I believe Groth simply is a college student who is upset because she cannot get away with something. Stacy, you and your 14 friends need to wake up and experience life.

In a few short years, you will be out on your own, and everything will not be handed to you, as you probably are accustomed to.

Do yourself — and us — a favor and grow up now.

Instructor thinks media distort Elian's coverage

Editor,

In its effort to present a balanced view of the sad saga of Elian Gonzalez on Tuesday, the editorial board found fault with all involved in this affair, in particular with Attorney General Janet Reno.

Yet, the aspect of this story that has been mishandled most grossly has been the way some Congressional representatives and some media outlets, including the Collegian, have handled the facts.

First, the Collegian accuses Reno of not having attempted to recover Elian peacefully before storming the Gonzalez household Saturday morning. However, the attorney general acted neither precipitously nor heavy-handedly. In fact, she showed enormous restraint, almost to a fault. She tirelessly struggled to seek a negotiated, peaceful resolution of the crisis, one brought on by the boy's great uncle's defiance of a court order to return Elian. When the raid took place, Elian's father already had been in this country for more than two weeks waiting to see his son.

The Collegian further contends that the existence of a search warrant giving INS agents the legal authority to enter the Miami relatives' house remains disputed. While some might contest the existence of the warrant, that it was issued is a matter of public record and fact. No doubt there are many who will not admit to facts that betray the illusions upon which they've built their causes. But such lapses of honesty and integrity do not alter facts.

Perhaps the basest canard perpetuated by some media is that the INS used force needlessly to recover Elian. However, a show of force is not the same as the use of force. In this case, the government showed force, but did not use it to prevent a more violent confrontation. In fact, the only ones using force were the violent demonstrators surrounding the Miami house, who threw trash cans and other objects at INS agents.

The Collegian also asserts that once Elian returns to Cuba, he will be paraded about by Castro as a political trophy. However, this is mere conjecture, born out of Ramboesque fantasies of life in a communist country. What is a fact, however, is the way the great uncle, Lazaro, paraded Elian on his shoulders nearly every day for months before the crowd that had gathered outside the Miami relatives' house.

What is a fact is the videotape the Miami relatives made of Elian at 1 a.m. in which the boy appeared and acted like a hostage.

What is a fact is that within Miami's Cuban community, those who wanted to see Elian reunited with his father have been silenced with threats against their livelihoods, and even lives, by the community's most fanatical opponents to Castro.

It is worth remembering that many of these zealots came to this country because they had been incriminated as cronies of Gen. Fulgencio Batista, Castro's predecessor, whose rule was no less repressive and corrupt than Castro's.

Indeed, in this whole tragic episode, Elian had ceased to be a motherless 6-year-old who needed the love of his father; in Miami he had become a metaphorical club used to beat Castro over the head. Whatever affection the great uncle and his daughter, Marielysis, might have had for Elian consistently was trumped by the Miami Cuban exile community's need to embarrass Castro. And so, too, was respect for the rule of law subordinated to that need.

From Watergate to Iran-Contra, the radicals among the anticommunist Cuban-American groups have been up to their eyeballs in the subversion of law and democracy.

Their cause has never been love of liberty and freedom; rather their cause has exclusively been a virulent hatred of Castro.

One does not have to be sympathetic to Castro or communism to see that those blinded by zealotry are incapable of seeing beyond their delusions.

Rape will end when men respect, learn word 'no'

Editor,

We recently have been exposed to a lot of discussion regarding violence against women at K-State. Events such as Take Back the Night and Take Back the Pride rallies can be incredibly empowering for participants.

But what about the rest of the population on this campus?

We conducted a survey of 316 K-State undergraduate students to determine the level of rape-myth acceptance on this campus.

The overwhelming majority of respondents bought into at least some of the myths we addressed. We found some results to be particularly startling.

More than 26 percent agreed that when women go around braless or wearing short skirts, they are asking for trouble. Men were twice as likely as women to believe this.

Also, nearly one in five respondents believed rape victims usually are a little to blame for the crime.

Both of these myths are inherently or blatantly victim blaming.

National surveys have shown that most rapes are planned a minimum of 30 minutes prior to the attack. Rapists make a conscious decision, and they must be made accountable for that decision, regardless of the victim's clothing or behavior.

Almost half revealed a belief that rapists have severe psychological problems. Despite media portrayals, it's not the stranger in the bushes perpetrating rape.

According to recent surveys, 84 percent of victims at least casually knew their assailant at the time of the attack. The K-State campus is not exempt from this.

In a recent letter to the editor, Paul English correctly states "the greatest number of rapes don't happen in a dark alley." They are being perpetrated by people we know. While we applaud the efforts of English as a step in the right direction, it falls short of its intent.

For one, English asserts, "the men on this campus know the difference between right and wrong." Do they? Using our survey to reflect the opinions of students, we found that so many rape myths are accepted that one cannot assume all men on campus know the difference between right and wrong.

We need to stop focusing on solutions that hold women responsible for crimes of rape and sexual assault being perpetrated against them, and begin focusing on solutions that stop men from raping in the first place.

Rape and sexual assault are men's issues. No woman asks or wants to be raped, regardless of what she wears or where she goes. If men are serious about forming solutions to stop rape, they must learn to value and respect the word no.

No means no — not yes, not maybe. It has been said that no is the end of a conversation, not the beginning of a negotiation.

We as women will not negotiate any further for our personal safety or freedom — nor should we have to.

Offensive line should be bigger, more athletic next season

By DEREK BOSS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

They do the dirty work, but that's what they prefer.

"We always like to run the ball," senior center Randall Cummins said. "The o-line — that's what we like to do, to get out there and hit each other around a little bit."

It's been that style of play that has predominated much of the Big 12 Conference, but the Wildcats are convinced that next year's offensive line will have both the size and athleticism to more than fit the profile.

"Without a doubt, I think Kansas State has always had a great line that can get down and get dirty in the Big 12," community college transfer Josh Scobey said. "I'm sure that this year will be another chance for them to have another Big 12 top offensive line."

This season, it will be a different front-line for the Wildcats, who will lose 6-foot-4-inch, 326-pound tackle Damion McIntosh and 6-foot-3-inch guard Ian Moses to graduation.

In fact, McIntosh was a third-round selection by the San Diego Chargers in the 2000 NFL Draft.

However, despite losing two big bodies, senior fullback Johnno Lazetich laughed when asked if K-State's line would be hurting for size.

"I wish you could see how these guys eat at training tables," Lazetich said, "because I seriously don't think size is going to be a factor this year."

In fact, redshirt-freshman Eli Roberson said K-State's offensive line will be more than ready to fill the void this fall.

"We lost a couple of big dogs, but they're coming along real good," Roberson said. "We get into the red zone, and they just explode and try to get it in the end zone. We've got a real good team coming up."

That team of offensive linemen is led by two veterans: senior Milford Stephenson and returning first-team All-Big 12 selection Cummins, who has made 25 consecutive starts for the Cats.

Both have accepted the role of teacher, as they lead by example for a less-experienced front line.

"Me and Milford both have helped them out a lot — some of the younger guys that need to step up and the second string," Cummins said. "We've tried to mold the o-line and be the leaders for them."

Roberson said Cummins has filled that role well, as his technique serves as a model for younger players.

"Randall knows his stuff," Roberson said. "He is a player that rarely makes mistakes on the offensive line."

Those minimal mistakes are important, senior quarterback

Jonathan Beasley said.

"With Randall, you know that he's going to do things to the best of his ability. He's one of those guys that knows (the playbook) pretty good, too, so sometimes he tries to test me," Beasley said.

"But we like to test each other to make sure that we're always on the same wavelength — 'cause without him, we can't move the ball."

Moving the ball on the ground is going to be a key to competing in a run-oriented conference, Beasley said.

"In the Big 12 now, that's what teams are doing — being able to smash the ball without having to pass the ball," Beasley said.

"because you want to be able to pound the ball and run the clock when you've got the lead."

However, before the Cats can think about this fall, the team is using the spring to organize the best group of offensive linemen possible.

"Right now, that's an area that we've got about 6 or 7 guys in there, and we're trying to put that all together right now," offensive coordinator Ron Hudson said. "We're trying to fit that all together and try to get the right mix."

"That's an area that we're spending a lot of time on — and we're getting better, we're doing all right."

Wildcats drop 4th straight

By MIKE VIETTI
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State threw four pitchers with less than 20 innings of work this season against Creighton on Wednesday and suffered a 12-3 loss to the Blue Jays.

It was the Wildcats' fourth straight loss, and freshman Spencer Black (9 1/3 innings pitched this season) started the game and went two innings, giving up one run. Freshman Greg English (8 1/3 innings this season) allowed five runs in the third inning to take the loss, and his record dropped to 1-1 on the season.

Senior Jason Taylor (seven innings this season) gave up an additional four runs in the fourth, while junior Scott Tallman (16 innings this season) allowed two runs in three innings before freshman Todd Lundwall (who has accumulated 37 innings this season) finished the game for the Cats by throwing a perfect ninth inning.

K-State did, however, get on the board first, in the top of the first when senior second baseman Chad Tabor led off the game with a double, stole second and then scored on a sacrifice fly by junior third baseman Josh Cavender.

The Cats then went scoreless until the eighth inning when senior first baseman Mark English doubled home junior outfielder Kasey Weishaar. The Cats added another run in the ninth when Weishaar knocked in Tabor with a two-out single up the middle.

Weishaar was 2-for-5 on the day, while English and junior outfielder Chris Nelson each went 2-for-4 to lead K-State from the plate.

With the loss to Creighton (31-12), K-State falls to 16-24 on the season. K-State is now 0-2 against Creighton this season, marking the first time the Cats have lost two in a row to the Blue Jays since 1985.

The Wildcats next play a three game series at Missouri this weekend at 7 p.m. Friday at Taylor Stadium in Columbia, Mo.

Late season losses spark Wildcat tennis team

Taking care of business. That's what head coach Steve Bietau is emphasizing to his team heading into today's first-round match against Missouri in the Big 12 Championship Tournament.

"Going into the tournament, first and foremost, we need to take care of Missouri," Bietau said. "I think we're the better team, but the better team doesn't always win. And I think a lot of our players want another shot at OSU."

The fifth-seed Wildcats (13-8, 7-4) will face No. 4 Oklahoma State at 11 a.m. Friday if they defeat Missouri this afternoon.

However, Bietau said it's important not to look past the 12th-seed Tigers.

"My hope is that the players that have come on strong late in the season, primarily (sophomores) Alena (Jecminkova) and Kathy (Chuda), can help lead us and we can get everyone to the level that we need them to be," Bietau said.

That level will be important as the Cats ended the regular season in the midst of a four-game conference losing skid despite starting the Big 12 season with a perfect 7-0 mark.

"The results in the last four matches are a combination of us not playing as well as we should and the schedule getting harder," Bietau said. "We played two of the top three teams in the final matches."

Those two teams include the Big 12's No. 3-seed Texas A&M as well as top-seed Texas. The Cats fell to the Aggies 6-3 and were defeated by the Longhorns 8-1 on April 15 and 16, respectively.

However, Bietau said he expects last Saturday's 5-4 loss to sixth-seed Nebraska should be the match that stems a significant increase in the Cats' motivation heading into today's Big 12 tournament opener.

Novotna' and Chuda selected to Academic All-Big 12 team

By DEREK BOSS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Junior co-captain Eva Novotna' and sophomore Kathy Chuda were two of 26 student athletes Thursday to be selected to the Academic All-Big 12 women's tennis first team.

Novotna' is a two-time first-team recipient for the Wildcats, while Chuda is making her first appearance on the chart.

To be nominated, an athlete must maintain a 3.20 grade point average or better for first-team status, or an average of 3.0 or higher for second team recognition, while competing in at least 60 percent of the team's scheduled contests.

Freshmen or transfer students are not eligible in their first year.

NBA's all-time winningest coach leaves after bad season

He only could take so much of the agony.

Lenny Wilkens, the winningest coach in NBA history, resigned Monday from the Atlanta Hawks after the worst season of his 27-year career.

Can you really blame him?

The Hawks struggled to a dismal 28-54 record, their worst since moving to Atlanta in 1968. They also missed the playoffs for the first time since 1992, losing 25 of their final 31 games of the season.

I'm not sure any coach, especially one experiencing as much success as Wilkens, could continue coaching a team like that.

Plus, Atlanta was, in fact, the organization that gave him the "utmost privilege" of coaching Isaiah Rider (you'll see why I used quotation marks).

Rider simply is a walking time bomb in the NBA. Nobody can coach him. Whatever team he goes to, with the exception of Portland last season (which surprised me), he consistently has wreaked havoc on coaches, players and general managers alike.

After being acquired by Atlanta,

Rider didn't show up for the first day of training camp, missed a practice and skipped a team flight. Finally, after two suspensions and the threat of another for repeatedly showing up late, he was waived with 18 games left in an already lost season.

That looks like it's a pretty clear sign that it's time for Wilkens to get the heck out of there, at least while he still has some pride left.

I mean, Wilkens is perhaps one of the greatest NBA coaches of all-time, when it comes to winning ballgames.

He boasts a career record of 1,179-981, including one NBA championship with the Seattle SuperSonics in 1979.

In addition, he was a nine-time NBA All-Star in his playing career in the pros. He and John Wooden are the only people who have been elected into the Hall of Fame as both a player and coach.

In 1997, he was honored as one of the 50 greatest players in NBA history and one of the 10 greatest coaches, the only person on both

Milberger ties for 8th at Big 12 tournament

By DEREK BOSS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Bryan Milberger hasn't been shy of success this season, and the Big 12 Golf Championship on Monday and Tuesday would prove no different.

The sophomore fired a 71-69-77 — 217 to tie for eighth individually at the Prairie Dunes Country Club in Hutchinson, Kan., as he was named to the Big 12 All-Tournament squad.

The finish is the highest ever for a Wildcat at the Big 12 Championship, including K-State's best individual mark at a conference meet since Troy Halterman notched seventh position at the 1996 Big 8 tournament.

However, Milberger actually was in a three-way tie for third place after Monday's 36-holes, heading into Tuesday's final round.

"My goal coming into this tournament was to play a solid final round," Milberger said following his performance Monday. "I have played well the first couple of rounds in a lot of tournaments but have dropped off during the last round."

"I want to put a good final round together, and now I guess I have the chance to do it at an important time."

Nevertheless, that chance surpassed Milberger, as Tuesday's round of 77 would drop the Cat five slots in the player field.

As far as the team went, it was a different year but the same result for the Wildcats.

For the second consecutive season, the K-State men's golf squad finished 10th at the Big 12 Championship, although the team sat in 9th position after day one.

The Wildcats score of 297-291-317 — 905 was only good enough to top conference foes Iowa State and Nebraska, while Oklahoma State walked away with its third conference title in four seasons.

The other four Wildcat individual finishes for the tournament include sophomores Matt Williams and Scott McNeely posting ties for 32nd and 43rd, respectively, while senior Mark Sears chipped in a 46th place tie and freshman Todd Rodemich mustered a tie for 56th.

Cat golfers receive academic honors

By DEREK BOSS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State's men's golf squad finished in a tie for the conference lead with Iowa State, Oklahoma and Texas this season.

However, this mark isn't referring to the team's showing on the golf course. It pertains to the Wildcats' performance in the classroom.

On April 19, three K-State student athletes were named to the men's golf Academic All-Big 12 first team.

It was the most selections for a Wildcat squad since it placed four members on the 1994 team, two earning first-team honors and two tallying honorable-mention status.

Sophomores Scott McNeely and Matt Williams, along with junior Dan Demory, were recognized by the conference for their scholastic achievements.

McNeely is making his second appearance on the academic team, as he was the lone Cat recipient of the award a year ago.

To be nominated for the first team, a student-athlete must maintain a 3.20 grade point average or better during their collegiate career.

lists. Also, he coached the 1996 U.S. Olympic team to a gold medal in Atlanta.

The list goes on.

Let's face it — Wilkens has proved himself. A coach of his caliber has no business being associated with the cellar-dwelling Hawks.

However, Atlanta hasn't always been such a struggling organization. In fact, during the first five seasons of Wilkens' seven-year stint as head coach, the team won at least 50 games on three occasions.

It's not Wilkens' fault for the Hawks' sudden decline — the problem lies in GM Pete Babcock.

I'm sorry, but Atlanta needs to get this guy out of office before the whole organization collapses.

Babcock was the person responsible for engineering a deal that sent Hawks' leading scorer Steve Smith to Portland for the infamous Rider and Jim Jackson.

Well, that turned out productive, didn't it? Give me a break.

Then, if that wasn't enough, Babcock traded longtime point guard Mookie Blaylock and wound up with seven new players on the roster this season.

If you're going to get rid of all your veterans, at least get some new and developing prowess. Now, Babcock and the Hawks are left with the leadership of a headcase like Dikembe Mutombo.

Need I say more?

Now, Atlanta is desperate for talent. Maybe Babcock will be smart enough to use his first round draft pick (which will be at least one of the top eight selections) wisely, along with more than the $10 million in salary-cap room for 2001.

But most likely, he won't.

If I were him, I'd be pressing to acquire an unhappy 76er named Allen Iverson. The point guard's bitterness against Philadelphia and GM Billy King make him a vulnerable target to leave head coach Larry Brown next season.

Anyway, now that all is said and done, Wilkens should be thankful to rid himself of the Hawks' organization, as I see them going nowhere fast.

In fact, I'd like to see the 62-year-old take over for Darrell Walker at the helm of the Washington Wizards. Walker already confirmed that he won't be back next season.

Just think about it for a minute.

Wilkens would team up with Michael Jordan, the Wizards' president of basketball operations and part-owner of the team. That kind of talent base is just scary to think about.

Actually, Jordan already has said he wants to hire a new coach within a month, as well as overhaul the entire front office of an operation that historically has been run on a shoestring budget.

I think hiring Wilkens could be a good start for Jordan in turning things around in Washington.

Yet it remains to be seen if Wilkens is considering finding another coaching position right away.

"I still enjoy coaching," Wilkens told ESPN on Monday from his suburban Seattle home. "I want to take some time off and just see what's out there. Hopefully, I will come to some conclusions, but I'm not rushing to do anything."

However, I think after scanning the numerous coaching vacancies that seem imminent for next season, the Wizards' job looks mighty appealing.

But then again, anything would look appealing for a coach who just suffered the worst season of his coaching career.

By the fall, Cummins said the offensive line's versatility will help the offense run smoothly.

"Pretty much, everyone we've got on o-line can play any other position," he said. "I know Milford has practiced at every position on the line."

Head coach Bill Snyder said he agreed.

"We do have some capacity to mix and match," Snyder said. "We can move people around pretty good and do so during the course of the spring."

Yet, if the fall season were to start today, Snyder said he'd have a relative idea of who'd be playing.

He projected that four of the five starters most likely would be junior John Robertson, who's made 10 consecutive starts for K-State, junior Andy Eby, Cummins and Stephenson.

As for the fifth and final spot, Snyder said it probably will be between juniors Matt Martin and Oshin Honarchian, or possibly sophomore Chris Bailes.

Plus, Thomas Barnett, who's off the team while resolving legal issues, also could add depth to the line.

"If Thomas were in our program, it definitely would alter a lot of things in regards to not only having great depth," Snyder said, "but how you mix and match could change as many as three people as far as their primary position."

As far as the likelihood of Barnett's return, Snyder said he is unable to comment on the situation.

"I can't address it because I don't know," Snyder said. "There's still some other issues before we even talk about football that need to be dealt with."

Disabled Kansans, advocates rally for funds

■ Legislators working to finalize spending bill amid Capitol steps rally.

BY DAVID MILES

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — More than 300 developmentally disabled Kansans and advocates had a Statehouse rally Wednesday to pressure legislators to increase funding for community services by nearly $13 million.

The rally occurred on the south steps of the Capitol as lawmakers worked inside on the final spending bill of the year.

The event was sponsored by Interhab, which represents service providers for the mentally ill and developmentally disabled.

The group wants legislators to increase state spending on services for the developmentally disabled by $12.7 million during the 2001 fiscal year, which begins July 1.

House Appropriations Chairman David Adkins, R-Leawood, was sympathetic but doubted the state has the money.

"We have spent every dime that we have available," said Adkins, who did not attend the rally.

About $7 million of the requested money would be used to increase the amount spent on service providers by 10 percent.

Some of that money would go toward raises for workers who help the developmentally disabled in their homes.

The other $5.7 million would be spent on reducing the number of people waiting for such services.

Tom Laing, Interhab's executive director, called the wages of those workers a travesty. Wages start at $7.30 an hour.

The money advocates are seeking would be on top of Gov. Bill Graves' recommendation to increase spending on the developmentally disabled by $11.3 million.

Laing acknowledged that Graves' plan should eliminate the current waiting list for services, which consists of about 300 people.

However, Laing said continued demand for services means the waiting list still will grow to about 700 by the end of fiscal 2001 if lawmakers reject his proposals for increased spending.

Laing encouraged people attending the rally to visit lawmakers.

"Let them see who it is that they talk about when they talk about the budget," he said.

Anne Hull, of Leawood, said she is concerned that her two developmentally disabled sons might not be able to live with her if the requested funding doesn't materialize.

The sons receive in-home care that would be endangered without the increase, she said.

She also lamented the wages paid to service providers.

"We have to be able to pay them enough so that they can buy their own dinner," Hull told the crowd.

"I hope it has a positive effect, because it had mostly a negative effect in the match," Bietau said. "We had a lot of performances below normal — below what we need to win."

"But the response in practice is up, so I hope it was a bit of a wake-up call."

That wake-up call will be important if the Cats wish to capitalize on their improvement from a year ago, when the team finished the season with a dismal record of 5-18, including 3-8 in the conference.

"We've made a significant increase as far as the regular season goes," Bietau said. "We started out strong, and we were one of two teams all year to beat (No. 2-seed) Baylor. Based on what's happened, we're definitely a better team."

THE ADVENTURE OF A LIFETIME BEGINS WITH AIR FORCE ROTC

Are you a:
- Freshman
- Sophomore
- Junior/Senior with 2 academic years to go starting fall semester

Air Force ROTC is an elective — but it's far more than that. Air Force ROTC is also a program that teaches you to be a leader, develops your management skills, and helps you grow into a well-rounded and self-assured person. For those who qualify, Air Force ROTC can even help pay for college through its scholarship programs. When you graduate, you'll also become an Air Force officer doing exciting, meaningful things alongside other great people in fascinating places around the world. If you're interested, it's not too late to join. There's no obligation — as a matter of fact, you don't have to decide to join the military until your junior year. So go ahead, give it a try — you won't regret it.

A higher degree of learning

Gen. Richard Myers chats with soldiers from Fort Riley after delivering a Landon Lecture on Wednesday morning. K-State Army and Air Force ROTC cadets also visited with Myers.

about challenges we'll face in the future," Cosgriff said.

Fellow AROTC member Karl Allen, senior in geology, said that when Myers was made available for a visit with K-State's military-in-training, he hoped to ask the general about certain points in his speech.

"I wish he had talked about military being deployed more and more with less resources, and how they would handle certain tasks," Allen said.

Student Body President Jake Worcester attended Wednesday's lecture for the first time with his new title and said he found his center-stage seat beneficial.

"Landon Lectures bring a lot to the campus, and I've been fortunate enough to attend a lot of them," Worcester said. "I look forward to the next one, and I hope we squeeze as many as possible into next year."

FACULTY

this current year there was a distinction between classified and unclassified salary increases," Wilcox said. "It looks like they're going to maintain that same distinction for the second year in a row."

Wilcox said the regents have been trying to impress upon the Legislature and others the imporance of both the ranked faculty and the other unclassified professionals.

"We haven't done a good job of sharing all of what the unclassified staff do," he said. "We have to do a better job."

To help unclassified employees understand why this two-tiered system of salary increases happened and what can be done to correct the problem, two meetings have been scheduled for 4 p.m. Wednesday and 1:30 p.m. May 11, both in Union 212.

Provost Jim Coffman, Vice President for Institutional Advancement Bob Krause and Vice President for Administration and Finance Tom Rawson will be at both meetings to discuss the issue with anyone interested.

"Everybody recognizes this as a problem and wants to do something about it," Gray said.

SCHEDULE

had the head of history department, the head of political science and the head of journalism," he said. "I looked for people that I thought would enjoy having dinner with Bob Woodward."

Myers had dinner with the adjutant general of the Kansas National Guard, the commanding general at Fort Riley and the publisher of the Manhattan Mercury. He also briefly met with ROTC students and engineering students.

Jake Worcester, student body president, said arranging more meetings between students and lecturers is something he wants to look into next year.

"I've heard from students that maybe there are some ways to improve the experience," he said. "It's nothing that we want to cause a stir over, but it's something that I think there's been some concern about."

"When the lecturers have a chance to sit down with students in a close, informal session, it's a great benefit and those are some of the things we'd like to explore."

Travis Lenkner, Student Senate chair, said students can learn from lecturers in informal settings, but he understands lecturers have tight schedules and other obligations to fulfill.

"It's a delicate balance between meeting with students, giving the lecture and actually meeting with patrons who underwrite the series," he said. "If there are other opportunities to meet more students, that would be great, but we shouldn't decrease patron involvement."

Reagan said the lecturers are accessible, and students who might want to talk with speakers should attend the lectures.

"I'd ask them to go to the lecture," he said. "Explain to me why so few of our students go to Landon Lectures. The lectures are open to the public. Anyone who wants to can go up to a microphone and ask a question afterwards."

He also said lecturers occasionally make unscheduled stops to meet with students who are around. He said Myers was no exception.

"After he finished, he talked to some students outside and then met with some students and had their pictures taken with him," he said.

Reagan said even scheduled events don't always happen as they're planned.

He said Cokie Roberts, ABC correspondent and past Landon lecturer, couldn't follow the schedule this past fall.

"I was shaving at 7 in the morning when I got a call from Cokie Roberts that her flight to Kansas City had been canceled," he said. "She said the closest she could get to us was St. Louis."

The lecture was supposed to start at 10:30 a.m., but was rescheduled for 1:30 p.m.

"I called up the Salina campus, and we flew over to St. Louis an hour early. Then we got a jet and flew back," he said.

Regardless of their schedules and who they meet with, Lenkner said the important thing to remember about Landon lecturers is they are brought to campus to enhance K-State.

"It's an important thing for the student body," he said. "But it's an important thing for the community as well. It's not just for the students or for the patrons. We share."

Authorities release Columbine footage

BY P. SOLOMON BANDA

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

GOLDEN, Colo. — To the horror of the Columbine victims' families, the sheriff's department decided to release video Wednesday of the dead and the dying, with some of the footage set eerily to a pop music soundtrack.

The material included helicopter footage of efforts to reach the victims outside the school, the damaged cafeteria, bullet-riddled classrooms and the library, where 10 students were killed.

"It hurts. They have pictures from the helicopter of dragging Richard by his feet," said Connie Michalik, whose son, Richard Castaldo, was shot outside the school and paralyzed.

Although the library footage was filmed after the bodies were removed, pools of blood on the carpet are obvious, with tags marking where those victims fell, all set to a musical background, said attorney James Rouse, who represents some victims' families. "Each one of those pools of blood is where someone's child died or was seriously wounded."

Under a court order, Jefferson County District Attorney Frank Huttless released the tapes to the victim's families Tuesday and planned to make copies available to the public Wednesday for $25.

Six victims' relatives had sued to gain access to the tapes to prove authorities mishandled the rescue and failed to heed warnings of the rampage. Authorities have declined those allegations.

But many Columbine families had hoped the tapes would not be released to the public. The tapes depict the carnage of April 20, 1999, when two students, Eric Harris and Dylan Klebold, killed 12 classmates and a teacher, wounded 23 others and committed suicide.

Resurgence of interest in Kansas wines began in backyard vineyard that led to Paxico's

FIELDS OF FAIR

STORY BY AMY CUNNINGHAM-WILSON • PHOTOS BY REED DUNN

He was known around Paxico, Kan., as Grandpa Fair, and his dream lives on as his business becomes a Midwest success story.

What began as an accidental hobby for Jim Fair turned into a productive business for his grandson.

Jim "Grandpa" Fair unofficially started his vineyard in 1980, when he planted grape vines to landscape the area around the pool in his backyard. Soon after, he was producing bottles of wine as gifts for family and friends. Donna Kohlmeier, Fields of Fair sales representative, said Fair's popular wines soon became the talk of the area, and in 1988, the Fields of Fair Winery was born.

Fields of Fair was the first licensed winery in Kansas since Carrie Nation and prohibition snuffed out the thriving Kansas wine industry. Harsh insecticides of the times soon took the grapes. Farmers replaced the troublesome grapes with more respectable and hearty crops. Before this time, Kansas was one of the top-five producers of grapes and wine in the country, Kohlmeier said.

In the 12 years Fields of Fair has been open, it has seen a resurgence of interest in Kansas wines. The winery also has ushered in the formation of the Kansas Grape Growers Association and the addition of six other wineries in the state.

"When we started out in our current location, we were selling between seven and 11 bottles a week," Kohlmeier said. "Now, we produce around 36,000 gallons a year. It really took off."

The original vineyard was started by Jim Fair and still is operating near St. George, Kan. The vineyard since has been sold to business associates but still is a main supplier to Fields of Fair.

Janet Forge of Prairie Ridge Vineyards said her vineyard has 15 acres of trellised grapes sold solely to Fields of Fair and a few local individuals.

"We harvested 18 tons of grapes last year for Fields of Fair, and we are gaining every year," she said.

Kansas wines, Kohlmeier said, are different from those produced in states such as California.

"You can't raise the same types of grapes in Kansas that are grown in California. For example, in California they are not allowed to add sugar to their wines, but here in Kansas, we can. In California they have to use sweet grapes to produce a sweeter wine. Those types of grapes cannot be grown here," she said.

Storing wines on their sides prolongs their shelf-life, Kohlmeier said. If you store a bottle standing straight up, the cork will dry out, allowing air into the bottle and ruining the wine.

"Our wines are table wines," she said. "You make them and then you drink them soon after they are bottled. They are different from those wines that have to be aged. Our wines, when properly stored, have a shelf life of about three years."

Fields of Fair offers its customers 11 different varieties of wines and a sparkling grape juice. It also personalizes bottles of wine by adding labels for any purpose, including weddings, birthdays or any function. Kohlmeier said many people from K-State and Fort Riley purchase specialized bottles for games and functions.

"We have businesses that are regulars," Kohlmeier said. "We work with Fort Riley and many other local businesses a lot. We can customize a label using computer graphics or by scanning a picture."

"We also have wines labeled with a Powercat," she said. "We charge a dollar more for those wines, but it goes directly to Kansas State. We also still have labels from all the bowl games."

During the Persian Gulf War, Fields of Fair sold special-edition bottles of wine to celebrate the return of soldiers from the war. Now, the bottles, a rarity, have been sold as collector's items.

"We used our Vintage One wine, and on the label we printed, 'To be opened upon a safe return,'" Kohlmeier said. "The people were lined up here to get that one. I heard that a bottle of that wine was sold for around $300."

Along with wine and wine accessories, the Fields of Fair Winery also serves gourmet foods such as salsa, marinades, pickled vegetables and the like, Sue Harris, assistant manager, said.

LEFT: The Fields of Fair Winery is located off Interstate 70 near Paxico, Kan. The winery was the first established winery in Kansas. TDP: Since Fields of Fair was established 12 years ago, it has won many state and national awards for its wines. The medals and plaques are on display in the taste testing section of the winery.

Knowledge of good wine improves lifestyle

I think wine makes life better.

If you don't drink wine regularly, you might not share my enthusiasm. But the more you know about wine, the more you will enjoy it. What I can do is share some of my knowledge about wine, and you can learn to recognize good flavor and character.

I grew up with the wines of California. My parents live in Southern California in the middle of the Central and South Coasts and Central Valley. As a family, we have traveled as far as the North Coast, famous for its Napa Valley, in search of new tastes in wine. I had toured wineries and savored the fruit before I even could drive a car.

California produces about 85 percent of the wine made in the United States and about 70 percent of the wine that is consumed here. My parents always have appreciated, and above all, fully enjoyed the taste of wine. Therefore, they chose to break my intimidation by wine and take advantage of the viticultural areas in which we live.

As an entry-level wine taster, my parents taught me a few lessons on how to detect good wine and how to evaluate wine discreetly. Since then, I have adopted a routine that might help you begin to evaluate wine.

OK, let's say you want to have a glass of wine with your meal in a restaurant setting. No one should feel intimidated by the process of ordering wine. If you are unfamiliar with the wine list, don't hesitate to ask a waiter or manager. In Manhattan, chances are the restaurant staff won't know the wine list, either. The wine list should be presented to you with the menu. That way you can plan the meal and choose a bottle of wine accordingly.

After you are presented with a wine, the waiter should pull the cork. You might want to sniff the cork because infected corks often cause spoiled wine. Check to make sure one side of the cork is wet. That way you know the wine properly has been stored on its side. I think it's proper if one person at the table takes the initiative to taste the wine.

The waiter pours less than a half-full glass of wine for the taster. Hold the glass by the stem and raise it toward the light to judge color and clarity. If a white wine is not clear and brilliant, and shades toward brown, this might be a good indication the wine is bad. Be sure to look for floating sediment in red wine; the wine might need to set for a day.

Swirl the wine around to sniff for aroma. The fragrance represents fermenting and aging. Look for what my dad calls "legs." Swirl the glass, then stop. Leg is the wine that drips, or crawls down the side of your glass. My dad says this helps you get an idea of what the texture is like — thick, thin, rich or bland.

Then sip and, holding the wine in your mouth, gently slosh it around. Think about what you taste and decide if the wine is balanced and flavorful. You should taste dryness or sweetness, tartness or smoothness.

If a bottle of wine passes all the above, it sounds like you have found yourself a great wine and an enjoyable evening. Wines bring us together, and just remember it is ours to enjoy as we choose. Wine is a good companion, however far you go with it. Just don't go too far or you might wake up with a serious hangover.

Exotic animal education goal for zoo

By JUSTIN SCHUSTER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A construction worker found an unattended boa constrictor in a shut closet while doing work in a fraternity house last May, said Schanee Anderson, curator of education at Sunset Zoological Park.

She said someone had placed the snake in a 20-gallon aquarium and shut it into a closet, sealed off from food, water and light.

Anderson said snakes can live without food, but they need water and light to survive. Also, because snakes are cold-blooded animals, the boa had no way to regulate its body temperature in the closet.

"Obviously, it was a lack of information and a lack of care on part of the owner," Anderson said.

She said Sunset Zoo receives hundreds of calls each year from pet owners who no longer want their exotic animals because they did not realize the amount of work involved in caring for them.

She said that when owners become overwhelmed, the animals begin to receive poor treatment.

"Pets in general should not be something bought on a whim," Anderson said.

She said Sunset Zoo's docents organization includes adult volunteers, who take a class to provide them with information on animal handling and care, as well as conservation.

"It's a really well rounded program to find out more about animals, conservation and zoos," Anderson said.

The zoo offers the 10-week class in September and January. It meets two hours a week, and the times vary to meet the schedules of the participants, Anderson said.

She said there is a nominal fee of $20 to pay for training materials.

Sunset Zoo, along with the docents organization, travels around Kansas with the animal ambassador program to educate people outside of Manhattan, Anderson said.

"We try to educate our adult volunteers about animals and conservation, and then we travel around the state with the animal ambassador program, trying to educate communities about native species as well as exotic animals," Anderson said.

To help educate, the program features live animals as well as bio-facts, which are items such as tiger skins and skulls.

James Carpenter, professor of exotic animal, wildlife and zoo animal medicine in the College of Veterinary Medicine, said the biggest problem with exotic animals as pets is that the owners don't do their homework and get an animal that is not appropriate for them.

He said the owners need to know the proper nutrition and husbandry for the animals.

"The majority of the problems are management related," Carpenter said.

He said prospective owners should learn about their animals beforehand, using resources like pet stores, libraries, magazines or veterinarians of exotic animals.

"It's really a big mistake when they just buy these animals on a whim," Carpenter said. "You're doing the animal a disservice."

Carpenter said neglecting a pet could lead to psychological and health problems for the animal as well as an overall poor quality of life.

He said owners should consider the size and attitude of the animal as well as its cost effectiveness and amount of management problems when deciding on a pet.

Carpenter said he also advises all owners to take their new pets to a veterinarian for an examination.

He said this helps ensure that the owner has a healthy animal, and it gives the vet a chance to outline for the owner proper ways to care for the pet.

A follow-up yearly exam also is important to the health of the animal, Carpenter said.

He said this is especially true for exotic pets because, unlike cats and dogs, they don't show early signs of problems or sickness.

Shanon Lee, owner of Animal House Pets, also said she thinks education is the most important aspect of buying an animal.

"They need to educate themselves prior to acquiring the pets," Lee said.

She said it's important to talk to several different people who have had experience with the prospective pet, and to do the proper reading.

"It's real important to make sure you're getting balanced information," Lee said.

'Take a daughter to work' to workplaces in Manhattan today

By DANICA COTO
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The average age of those working today will drop drastically.

It won't be unusual to see a 10-year old at a board meeting or a 5-year old in class.

However, instead of celebrating the national "Take Your Daughter to Work" Day, it will be "Take a Daughter to Work" in Manhattan.

Events for this day were organized by a K-State Women in Leadership class.

"It's important for young women to learn what opportunities are out there in the workplace and learn to set goals for their future," Shana Knoblock, senior in public relations, said.

This is her first time in such a class, but participating in such a project was worth it, she said.

The class also inspired her classmate, Karla Johnson, senior in social sciences, who said she'll bring her 5-year-old niece.

"I don't have a daughter myself, but I realize how important it is," Johnson said. "I've always been told I can do whatever I want and it hasn't always been feasible."

"It's important for young women to learn what opportunities are out there in the workplace and learn to set goals for their future."

— Shana Knoblock,
senior in public relations

The class decided to change the name of the day to "Take a Daughter to Work" because most students don't have daughters, she said.

Class members also organized a sack lunch for noon at Triangle Park and invited Katie Philp, Northview Elementary principal, to talk about the changes she's seen in the last four decades in schools and the opportunities women have received.

"We wanted to do a sack lunch so hopefully people could take their lunch break and could come and have a speaker and interact with each other," Johnson said. "They need to see that it's OK to want to succeed and want to have all these options."

Knoblock said it's important to have mentors because they can help young women boost their self esteem and encourage them.

In addition, it's a good opportunity for young women to meet other young women who are in the same situation, Johnson said.

"I'm thinking about junior high age, when girls have more inhibitions about themselves, their bodies and being around people in public,"

she said. "It's good for them to see that there's other girls like them, that it's OK to be different from the norm."

In past years, the Women's Center has organized the event. Now, however, they're concentrating to make it a group event so more people will get involved, said Susan Allen, director of the Women's Center.

"I'm just thankful that the students are willing to take it on as their class projects and that they're responsible enough to get it done," she said.

"I don't think it's been a big event at K-State, so that's what we're trying to work on."

Charlene Brownson, education coordinator at UFM community learning center, said she's taking her youngest daughter this year because her other daughters have gone before.

She said it will give her daughter an opportunity to see what her day is like and what the work world looks like.

This isn't her biggest concern, though.

"I think a lot of people are not aware that it is a 'Take Your Daughter to Work' day," she said. "There is a need to build more awareness and take advantage of it."

Supreme Court struggles with Boy Scout case

By LAURIE ASSEO
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Supreme Court justices struggled Wednesday over whether to let the Boy Scouts of America bar homosexuals from serving as troop leaders, role models in an organization that teaches its members to be morally straight.

Without saying how they ultimately will vote, several justices voiced skepticism about how far the court could go to force open admissions upon private organizations.

"In your view, a Catholic organization has to admit Jews" and "a Jewish organization has to admit Catholics," Justice Stephen G. Breyer told Evan Wolfson, the lawyer for James Dale of New Jersey, a former assistant scoutmaster ousted when the organization learned he is gay. Dale subsequently filed suit against the Scouts.

Justices Sandra Day O'Connor and David H. Souter followed

Breyer's line of questioning, asking Wolfson whether his argument meant the Scouts could be required to admit girls.

Justice Antonin Scalia voiced his reservations another way.

"They think that homosexuality is immoral," he said, asking why the Scouts must accept as a leader that someone who embodies a contradiction of their message.

The Scouts require members to promise to be clean and morally straight. But Wolfson said the Scouts are not primarily an anti-gay organization and therefore Dale's presence did not burden the group's message.

Dale did not seek to use his leadership position to advocate homosexuality, Wolfson said.

New Jersey's highest court ruled that the Boy Scouts' ban on gay troop leaders violated a state prohibition on discrimination in public accommodations. But the Scouts say the state law violates the organization's rights of free speech and free association under the Constitution's First Amendment.

Some justices also had pointed questions for the Scouts' lawyer, George Davidson.

Justice John Paul Stevens asked whether a homosexual could be excluded if he did not publicly declare his sexual orientation but it was discovered against his wishes.

Yes, Davidson said, arguing that the organization had a right to choose the moral leaders for the children in the program.

"Boy Scouting is so closely identified with traditional moral values that the phrase, 'He's a real Boy Scout,' has entered the language," Davidson said. The Scouts believe homosexuality does not fit that moral code, he said.

Souter told Davidson, "Mr. Dale is not asking to carry a banner. He's saying, 'I'm not going to carry a banner.'"

Dale and his parents attended the argument, and he spoke afterward to reporters.

"I have always loved the Boy Scouts of America," he said. "It's a program that I hold dear to my heart, and I hope to one day be able to be back in the program." Being morally straight means standing up for yourself and being honest, he added.

Wednesday's argument was the last for the court's present term, and the justices are expected to decide by July whether the Scouts had the right to revoke Dale's role as a troop leader.

Dale was 19 and an assistant scoutmaster of a Matawan, N.J., troop when in 1990 he was identified in a newspaper article as co-president of a campus lesbian and gay student group at Rutgers University.

The Scouts' Monmouth Council revoked Dale's registration as an adult leader, telling him the organization does not allow openly gay members.

Dale sued, contending the Scouts violated New Jersey's anti-discrimination law.

Gay couples gain benefits from new Vermont law

By ROSS SNEY
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

MONTPELIER, Vt. — Gov. Howard Dean signed a first-in-the-nation law Wednesday granting gay couples nearly all of the benefits of marriage.

"I think it is a courageous and powerful statement about who we are in the state of Vermont," the Democrat said. "I also believe that this legislation speaks to the heart of this state, and certainly to my heart."

The legislation creating marriage-like civil unions reached the governor's desk shortly before lunchtime, just a day after the House gave its final approval. And by the time of a 2 p.m. news conference, he already had signed it out of view of TV cameras, photographers and reporters.

Dean said he signed the bill privately because he did not want the ceremony to be a triumphal party by supporters of the law. Instead, he said, it was time for the state to begin healing.

"In politics, bill-signings are triumphal," he said. "They represent overcoming of one side over another. These celebrations, as the subject of the matter of the bill, will be private."

The law will allow gay couples to form civil unions beginning July 1. That will entitle them to all of the hundreds of rights and responsibilities available to married couples under Vermont law in such areas as taxes, inheritance and medical decision-making.

Other states probably will not recognize Vermont civil unions, and such status will not entitle gay couples to any the benefits available to married couples under federal law in areas such as taxes and immigration.

Colbert Hills to celebrate opening

By RICHARD SMITH
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The wait finally ends for area golfers this weekend. Sort of.

The new Colbert Hills Golf Course will make its long-awaited debut Monday. The course, which has taken more than six years from conception to completion, is expected to be a haven for golf buffs statewide.

It already has been rated the most challenging course in Kansas and compares favorably in the rating system to the Augusta National Golf Course, home of the Masters tournament.

Athletic director Max Urick said the course should give a boost, not just to K-State or the men's and women's golf teams, but to the entire Manhattan community.

"It's such an asset to have a golf course of this quality here in Manhattan," Urick said.

"This is a world-class course. It will attract people from all over the country, and possibly the world, to come here and play. It's a unique setting."

Monday will mark Colbert Hills' official opening with the dedication of the course, the Earl Woods National Golf Academy and the Ron Fogler Recognition Monument at an invitation-only ceremony.

Average Manhattan-area hackers, however, will have to bide their time just a bit more, as the first day for public tee times will be May 7.

In the interim, K-State has a week of gala festivities planned to christen its one-of-a-kind course in one-of-a-kind style.

Highlights of the week will include a Pro-Am tournament for selected donors, featuring course namesake and K-State alumnus Jim Colbert, Lee Trevino, Annika Sorenstam and others Monday, as well as the public opening of the "Dear Friends: Views of the American West" exhibit at the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art on Tuesday.

Days set aside for alumni and campus groups and the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce will keep the course bustling in the latter half of the week.

Once Sunday rolls around, golf aficionados can savor 18 holes of PGA-caliber golf, if they are willing to pay the requisite price. Colbert Hills' all-inclusive fees (golf cart, green fees, and driving range privileges) run $59 Monday through Thursday, and $79 on weekends.

The fee will be less for K-State students, faculty and staff, who will receive a 25-percent discount, and for alumni, who will receive a 15-percent discount. A stand-by rate of $35 Monday through Thursday and $45 on weekends also will be available to those willing to play on standby. Reserved tee times can be arranged by calling 776-6475.

Though the prices might be a bit more expensive, Colbert Hills general manager David Gourlay said high fees were a necessary evil that came with the costs of building such a high-caliber golf course.

"If this course were built anywhere but in Manhattan, I have to say it would probably cost you $125 to $165 to play," Gourlay said. "It's not like any other golf course you see in Kansas. It's one you would see on the PGA Tour."

Gourlay also said the course's opening appears to be worth the wait.

"I have to think Colbert Hills will surpass anything that has been in Kansas before and will be comparable to any of the courses you'll see on the PGA Tour," Gourlay said. "They could put a PGA event out there tomorrow, and it would be equally as challenging as the best course played by the pros."

Daughters step in for parents at work for national day

Speech honors women's achievements over time

America's founding fathers did not design equal rights and protection for women, Northview Elementary principal Katie Philp said Thursday.

Women have made great strides to overcome these inequalities, but the changes have been slow, she said. Nearly 100 years after Susan B. Anthony's birth, her efforts to improve women's rights finally paid off when women gained the right to vote.

"It amazes me how much of Anthony's life was devoted to advancing the rights of women — only to pass the torch on to the next generation," Philp said.

Philp discussed the changes in women's rights throughout the past four decades during a luncheon in honor of K-State's Take a Daughter to Work Day at Triangle Park on Thursday. The K-State Women's Center organized the luncheon.

"Girls need positive role models who can help them discover options for future careers," Philp said.

A recent government study showed that 7.1 million women had full-time executive, administrative and managerial positions in 1998, she said. This is a 29-percent increase since 1993.

However, even though women have similar positions, they are not receiving similar salaries, Philp said. A study from the Organization of Women Executives in Katie started the morning by scanning tests. A little while later, she created bar codes and fixed a computer. She ended the morning by conducting a video phone call.

While this might sound like a routine day for a computer information specialist, it was far from ordinary for 10-year-old Katie Scott.

Around the nation, millions of girls like Katie participated in Take Your Daughter to Work day on Thursday. This program was created in 1993 after researchers discovered a radical shift occurring in the lives of young adolescent girls.

According to the Ms. Foundation for Women Web site, as adolescence begins, girls show a drop in self-esteem, report a lowered sense of self-worth and describe intense feelings of insecurity about their own judgment and emotions.

This focus on appearance and how boys view them prevents many girls from competing with or in front of boys at school, the site said.

In order to expand girls' horizons and help them remain confident in their talents, the Ms. Foundation for Women created the Take Your Daughter to Work program for girls ages 9 to 15.

The program emphasizes the importance of girls' abilities rather than their appearance. The day-at-work-idea was created to heighten girls' aspirations and help them understand the connection between academic success and success in the work force, the site said.

Dan Scott, computer information specialist in the Department of Animal Science and Industry at K-State, said he and his wife, Gina, decided to take Katie to work with them Thursday to expose her to their jobs as well as possible careers for her future.

"I want to work with computers when I grow up," Katie said. "Going to work with my parents is fun and helps me learn new things."

Katie, a fourth grader at Northview Elementary, said her favorite part of working with her dad was grading the college students' Scantron tests.

In the afternoon, Katie went to work with her mother, a systems programmer/analyst II, at K-State's veterinary medicine clinic.

"I thought it would be neat to show her what goes on behind the scenes at the clinic, even though it's not my actual job," Gina said. "Now she knows what happens when we take our dog or cat to the vet. She also helped type in some data entry projects for me."

Besides learning about her parents' jobs, Katie was able to learn about the hard work that goes in to taking care of a family, Gina said.

"We're always trying to teach her the value of a dollar," she said. "This gave us the chance to teach her how that dollar is earned."

Pam Vander Pol, senior in women's studies and accounting, took her 7-year-old daughter, Ashley, to work and class with her Thursday.

"Too many times, society tries to make girls believe that college is hard and not necessarily for them," Vander Pol said. "I want my daughter to know that college is not an unattainable goal, and that I believe in her abilities."

Ashley, a first-grader at Eugene Field Elementary School, Spring game on Saturday

■ KSU football preview might determine starting positions.

By NICK BRATKOVIC
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State football program has its annual spring game at 1:10 p.m. Saturday, a chance for players to make one last impression on coaches and fans before summer vacation begins.

Competition has become the buzzword in Manhattan this spring as a lot of the team's starting positions hang in the balance.

K-State head coach Bill Snyder said he is looking for depth in all of his positions. He said there have been a variety of factors so far that have affected his team's ability to have a quality two-deep chart at the different positions.

"We haven't been able to do that part due to injury," Snyder said.

One spot that stands above all in the competition battle — quarterback.

It is a position that has been looked at as a battle between quarterbacks Jonathan Beasley and Eli Roberson from the end of last season.

Snyder said nothing has changed yet, and Beasley is the team's top signal caller.

"Nothing has changed, it is competitive, there would have been expectations whether I said anything or not," Snyder said. "Jonathan went in as our No. 1 quarterback,

Renovations at Varney's to end this year

By ANGELA KISTNER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Movie posters from the 1930s and a popcorn box from the 1920s are just a few of the things that will be on display at Varney's Book Store after renovations are complete.

Varney's also will have a large display area full of historic pictures that will be free for the public to visit.

"We're thinking about calling it the Aggieville Gallery," said Dan Walter, textbook manager and Aggieville historian. "It will be a place that K-State alumni will want to come visit when they're in the Aggieville area."

Jon Levin, owner of Varney's, said there isn't a definite timeline for when the renovations will be finished, but he said it would be sometime this year.

However, when students come back in August, Levin said the new textbook area, which will be on the second floor of the theater building, should be done.

Conference rooms also will be on the second floor. Levin said these will be used for a variety of things, and the public might be able to reserve them for its own use.

There also will be a new entrance and exit. The existing one will stay the same, and one will be added underneath the marquee, Levin said.

New electronic postmark stamp confirms e-mail date

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The Postal Service launched its new electronic postmark service Thursday, offering a means of dating and securing e-mail.

An electronic postmark is not a new e-mail service, but rather an additional feature available through any e-mail service. It provides a Postal Service date stamp to guarantee the date the message was sent.

The message cannot be changed without the alterations being obvious, postal officials said.

Postal spokeswoman Sue Brennan likened the system to mailing a postcard written with indelible ink. It has a postmark to prove when it was sent, and it can't be changed without that being obvious.

The first Internet company to offer the service is PostX Corp. of Cupertino, Calif. Others are expected to join in.

"The Electronic Postmark will give online communicators a little peace of mind and add a level of trust and security that Americans have come to expect from sending a regular hardcopy letter," Deputy Postmaster General John Nolan said.

The post office said it expects the Electronic Postmark to be of particular interest to businesses and individuals who need secure electronic transmission of financial transactions and confidential data, so they can detect if a document or file has been tampered with in transit and to provide evidence that the document existed at a specific time and date.

The Internet companies pay the Postal Service for offering the Electronic Postmark, and then can charge their customers a fee. The amount of that charge was not immediately available.

Former executive convicted on conspiracy, fraud counts

NEW YORK — A former top Wall Street executive was convicted Thursday of giving inside information on business deals to his porn-star girlfriend.

James McDermott Jr., 48, was found guilty of conspiracy and securities fraud by a federal jury along with Anthony Pomponio, 45. Both men face up to 10 years in prison.

McDermott, a former chief executive at the investment bank of Keefe, Bruyette & Woods, was accused of giving inside information to 30-year-old Kathryn Gannon. She and Pomponio, a New Jersey businessman, then allegedly made $170,000 in illegal profits.

The judge barred any mention of Gannon's career in X-rated movies, ruling that she could be described to the jury only as an actress, dancer and model who sometimes goes by the stage name Marilyn Star.

McDermott and Pomponio both admitted to having extramarital affairs with Gannon but denied they engaged in insider trading.

Gannon is a fugitive. Prosecutors have sought her extradition from Canada, where she is believed to be living.

Hearing date set to discuss solution for airport dispute

LOS ANGELES — Rep. Patrick Kennedy was ordered Thursday to appear at an informal hearing to try to work things out with an airport security guard who claims he shoved and grabbed her in a dispute over his bag.

Rather than file a misdemeanor battery charge, which would carry up to six months in jail and a $2,000 fine, the city prosecutor's office ordered the May 12 meeting between the two in front of a hearing officer.

"It's a closed, informal, quasi-judicial hearing so both parties can discuss this. We refer cases to the hearing because we feel they can be resolved," Mike Qualls, spokesman for the city attorney, said.

Such hearings take place in 25,000 to 30,000 cases a year. The hearing officer will prepare a report for the city attorney, who will decide whether to file charges.

"The final decision on the case is made after the hearing, but nine out of 10 are resolved, and there are no charges," Qualls said.

In a statement, the congressman said: "From the night of the incident on, I have stated my regret that I acted rudely. I also have said that I regret how this has been blown way out of proportion. I am now hopeful that, with this office procedure, the matter will be closed."

CAR CARE

University of Michigan senior Chris Foland makes some last-minute adjustments to his baja car to prepare for Saturday's race, which will take place at the School Creek Off-Road Vehicle area of Milford Lake.

More than 80 teams, including teams from Canada and Mexico, will be competing this weekend in the Society of Automotive Engineers' Mini Baja West competition.

Teams will show off their cars' performances during the hill climb, maneuverability and acceleration event from 8:30 a.m. to 5 p.m. To get to the off-road vehicle area of Milford Lake, take Exit 290 off Interstate 70 and follow Milford Lake Road north about five miles. Take County Road 837 west and north 10 miles, where signs will direct to the area.

Yahoo! ranks K-State 33rd in 'wired' survey

By STEPHANIE J. BONNELL
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students were required to wait in line to get football tickets during the 1997 school year. Now, three years later, students are purchasing tickets via KATS.

Yahoo! Internet Life Magazine has ranked K-State as the 33rd "most wired" school in the nation out of 1,300 two-year and four-year schools. In 1999, K-State was ranked 129th.

All 3,631 open-enrollment accredited undergraduate two-year and four-year institutions in the United States were invited to participate in this year's survey.

There were four judging criteria: access and infrastructure, administrative, general resources and support.

"We're extremely pleased that the creativity of the K-State faculty and staff has allowed us to win this kind of recognition," said Beth Unger, vice provost for academic services and instruction.

The overall score given to K-State was 82.06, which is up from 62.64 in 1999. K-State was just 7.07 points behind the leader, Carnegie-Mellon University, which was ranked first overall with a rating of 89.15.

Courtney Briscoe, junior in management information systems, said she enrolled in summer classes at another school but was unable to use an online resource.

"A lot of schools don't have as much on the Internet as K-State," Briscoe said. "Some just have Web pages."

In a 1997 survey, the magazine said the year 2000 was a big concern for K-State, but that the university was ready.

Since this survey, K-State has added online registration, drop/add and course schedules. Also, in a 1999 survey, it was found that K-State provides 5.7 computers per 100 students.

"The factors that we see as extremely important in this year's rating are those that provide student services and improve functionality," Unger said.

Giuliani's Senate run may end due to cancer

By TIMOTHY WILLIAMS
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — Mayor Rudolph Giuliani disclosed Thursday that he has prostate cancer and acknowledged that while the disease was caught early, it could spell the end of his Senate run against Hillary Rodham Clinton.

Appearing upbeat and energetic at a City Hall news conference, Giuliani, 55, confirmed speculation that started Wednesday evening when he was seen entering a hospital and leaving three hours later.

"I was diagnosed yesterday," Giuliani said. "It's a treatable form of prostate cancer. It was diagnosed at an early stage."

The Republican mayor said he would continue his Senate run for now but would make a more definitive statement in two to three weeks after he decides on a course of treatment. He still plans campaign appearances in Saratoga and Buffalo today and Saturday.

"I really need to know what the course of treatment is going to be before I can evaluate," he said. "And then, after I determine that, then I will figure out does it make sense this year or doesn't it or whatever."

Treatment of the cancer almost certainly would require as much as several weeks away from City Hall and off the campaign trail.

The first lady, who was campaigning in the upstate village of Penn Yan, spoke briefly by telephone with the mayor and wished him a speedy and complete recovery, said Clinton spokeswoman Karen Dunn.

Clinton did not even obliquely criticize Giuliani, as she has done at many of her recent campaign appearances. Aides said that given the news of the mayor's health, even a veiled political attack would have been inappropriate.

Rep. Rick Lazio, who has considered challenging Giuliani for the GOP Senate nomination, issued a statement offering his prayers and support, adding that health issues transcend politics.

Database to include summer employment listings

■ Service provides job listings, chances to win money, prizes for work.

By TAMARA MANN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Career and Employment Services soon will expand the database of employment information to include opportunities for summer jobs.

The database expansion will include listings of summer jobs, summer internships and a list of salary ranges for each of the areas. At this time, the database has limited employment information.

"We currently keep track of where students are at, what they are doing after they graduate and salary ranges, but we would like to find out where undergraduate students go and what they do during the summer time," said Mary Marston, assistant director and coordinator of experimental learning for Career and Employment Services.

"We hope to use the database to keep track of how much students earn over the summer," she said. This would allow us to provide a salary range for students searching for summer jobs."

Career and Employment Services has attempted to provide a database of summer jobs in the past, but had problems gathering accurate information.

"The information we had in the past was pretty spotty. It's hard to determine anything when we only receive information from about 200 students," Marston said. "If we only receive information from one kinesiology student who makes $5 an hour, then it's hard to give an adequate salary perspective to students."

If students report their jobs, they could win prizes from Career and Employment Services.

"If students report their jobs, then they are eligible for a drawing on May 5. The prizes are things that have been donated by different companies who have visited campus. We would like to see the number of students who report their jobs jump from 200 into the thousands," Marston said.

Some of the prizes include $50 off an airline ticket, a remote control car, an inflatable couch with a cooler, a raft, a cooler and a backpack.

To enter the drawing, students can report their summer jobs by logging on to the Career and Employment Services Web page at www.ksu.edu/ces and going to the "what's hot" button.

The jobs Career and Employment Services will be reporting are not necessarily just internship positions, but focused toward anything career related.

"We want to do as much job development as possible for students so that they can have opportunities to become familiar with all areas of their career," Marston said.

Maggie Irvin, senior in international business marketing, said Career and Employment Services is a useful tool that students should use.

"CES is a service that's right at your back door. It's foolish not to take advantage of what they have to offer," she said. "I have been able to explore some fantastic companies by using their services. Any addition that would allow students to further explore career opportunities, while focusing on a specific job, is a definite asset."

Unranked faculty deserve money, respect

K-State administration needs to push to bring unclassified employees the salaries — and the respect — they deserve.

The Kansas Legislature allocated a 5.9-percent increase for ranked faculty — instructors, associate professors, assistant professors and full professors. Unranked faculty — advisers, physicians, computing technologists and librarians — will receive only a 2.5-percent increase.

This is a negative situation for several reasons. First, it creates a division between ranked and unranked faculty. Such a division is undesirable because it creates jealousies and leads to a tense work environment.

More importantly, denying unranked faculty a salary increase equivalent to ranked ones does not do them justice. In many cases, these unranked faculty are the heart and soul of the campus, the faculty with whom students interact and do the majority of their out-of-classroom learning.

This is not to say ranked faculty did not deserve the raise they were given. All faculty at K-State are grossly underpaid.

In an ideal situation, both ranked and unranked faculty would be properly compensated for the superior work they perform at K-State. But the situation is far from ideal. Any increase the Legislature grants is viewed as a blessing, regardless of how it is divvied up.

Ranked faculty definitely deserve their increase. They need a raise to keep their salaries competitive with other universities. If they are not,

K-State will lose professors. If it loses professors, it loses students. If it loses students, it will not need those other faculty members.

In maintaining ranked faculty, others must not be forgotten.

Ranked faculty give K-State its excellent reputation to attract students.

Unranked faculty keep those students here.

The Collegian's Reader Forum is an anonymous call-in system that allows readers to voice their opinions on any topic for 20 seconds.

Are we leaving that lone tree in front of Seaton Hall for a certain group? Say, the Beta Sigs?

Did Ken Wells have ADD?

I'd rather be hung on a cross than read one more of Scott Roney's columns this semester.

I was wondering what the deal was with seven of my fraternity brothers being placed in the off-campus section of the yearbook.

You know you're in a small town when a Christian holiday makes the front page of the Collegian.

K-State tries every day to get rid of our reputation of being a farming school. I'm confused. Isn't equestrian a farming sport? Are we not the softball state?

Hey, Acacia, it wasn't lack of alumni support that got you shut down. It was hazing. Take some responsibility.

Hey, Max, last time I checked, horses were not cheap to take care of. That's why my parents wouldn't get me a pony when I was a kid.

To the developing scholars program: don't you think everyone hates being in big classes? Why should minorities get special treatment and personal attention from professors? Instead of focusing your efforts on a special few, look at curbing the dropout rate for all students at K-State. That would benefit the university as a whole.

Lafene health care: you get what you pay for.

I'm greek. I hate our president. I hate our house. Greek is stupid. All it is, is a bunch of backstabbers and a bunch of sell-outs.

I think we should readmit Acacia into the greek system because between alcohol and hazing, those are the only two things that keep the greek system going.

Women's sports needs its own section so I can take it out and throw it away.

internet IDENTITIES

Web chat rooms allow false identities, pose threat of violence to innocent children

What a sick man. Daniel William Honzik, you make me sick to my stomach.

Any 38-year-old who will drive from Colorado Springs, Colo., to Manhattan with apparent plans to visit someone they met over the Internet is questionable enough. Throw in a 25-year age difference, and it is even worse.

Honzik was arrested at 10 p.m. April 20 in Manhattan City Park. That was the place he allegedly was supposed to meet a 13-year-old girl he had met online — a girl who appeared to have captured his heart, making him drive from Colorado to meet her.

But he must have had other things on his mind than taking the girl out for ice cream and meeting her family.

That probably was the last thing he had planned.

He was charged with attempted rape, attempted aggravated indecent liberties with a child and attempted aggravated indecent solicitation of a child. With no prior convictions, he faces a maximum of 99 months behind bars.

But Honzik didn't get to meet his would-be victim. The reason is because she doesn't exist. At least, her existence is not what he expected.

Julie Posey is not 13 years old. In fact, she doesn't live in Manhattan. The Colorado resident has a mission to end solicitation of children via the Web. Posey had helped set up a sting operation with the Riley County Police Department.

This isn't the first time Posey's hard work has paid off in Kansas.

In 1998, she assisted the Sedgewick County Sheriff's Office to put Manhattan resident Gary Woellhof behind bars. This was after Woellhof had placed an ad online seeking an orgy with a mother and daughter.

Posey has helped put two disturbed men behind bars.

But how many other men have alleged intentions like Honzik and Woellhof? How many 13-year-olds aren't fictitious?

I don't trust chat rooms. It seems like a key spot for those who stretch the truth and flat-out lie.

How many girls have you met in chat rooms who have blonde hair, blue eyes, are 5-foot-7-inches, 115 pounds, sweet and beautiful? If that is the case, why are they in the chat room?

And there are the guys who claim to have a six-pack stomach. Usually, they should write keg instead of six pack. The lies that can be told are endless. If you are male, you suddenly can be female. If you are a toothpick, you suddenly have an hourglass figure. If you work as a cashier, you suddenly can be a successful business owner.

Even those who send accompanying pictures can be lying.

They don't necessarily have to be pictures of them. That is where ads like Victoria's Secret come into play.

As adults, you often realize the lies people can write over the Internet.

As a 13-year-old, it isn't always the same.

ADAM HAYES/COLLEGIAN

Violation decision makes 'no tolerance policy' hypocritical, sets poor precedent for future actions

Undoubtedly, everyone has heard the cliché, "If you do the crime, you do the time" — except for a few within the greek community.

Perhaps I'm being harsh, but those within the greek system could not openly disclose whether they actually have heard this cliché because that would break their strict code of beating around the bush, especially when talking to outsiders. Besides, this is the same community that banished Acacia less than a year ago and recently approved its readmittance well before its five-year sentence was complete.

Acacia was removed from campus May 9, 1999, after the Interfraternity Council found the fraternity guilty of four hazing violations, three substance-abuse violations and two human-rights violations that were brought forth by a pledge. The resulting sanction — under IFC's highly acclaimed no tolerance policy — was for Acacia to be unaffiliated with K-State for five years.

Then, earlier this month, this changed when the IFC's Board of Directors and the Fraternity Council of Presidents voted to readmit Acacia.

So, what happened to this all-encompassing no tolerance policy? Call me crazy, but I thought no tolerance would mean exactly that — no tolerance.

I just hope the greek community is prepared to deal with the precedent set by allowing Acacia to return before its five-year suspension is complete.

For starters, it makes the no tolerance policy about as useful as the Gongfarmers comic strip — good for a laugh. Now that the fear of receiving harsh punishment for similar violations is gone, it only is a matter of time until another incident of hazing occurs — although some would argue until they are blue in the face that hazing no longer occurs.

Additionally, it appears money does talk, and alumni seem to wield enough power to push around the greek governing bodies. IFC President Mike Goodpasture admits Acacia was kicked off campus for something to do with hazing, but said it mainly was because there was an extremely weak alumni response. So, now that Acacia has a new mission statement and alumni support, it appears it will be a place to find nice gentlemen to date your little sister and a place where you would want your little brother to live.

OK ... sure. Everybody knows a new plan and a bunch of promises mean nothing. Just look at how effective the no tolerance policy has been, despite all of its promises. Basically, this means whenever a house gets into trouble — no matter how serious — all they have to do is turn to rich alumni to work everything out.

To this, many would reply, "Well, you don't know the entire story." And they are right — I have no idea what really happened in that fraternity house. But guess what? Neither does the rest of campus. We are not trying to misrepresent the story — we are not given the entire story to begin with.

Imagine trying to write a book report when all you are given is the cover.

For instance, all we know is that Acacia was in part sanctioned because of two human-rights violations. What exactly did they do that constituted a human-rights violation?

After all, a human-rights violation sounds rather severe. Not knowing exactly why Acacia was suspended from campus in the first place, not to mention why it is being allowed to return after only a year, has upset many people, both greek and non-greek.

Sadly, the greek system's refusal to disclose information is not isolated to the Acacia issue and has resulted in a public-perception nightmare. It now seems to many people that the greek community has something to hide, and that there is something more to the trendy tech-vests and purchasing of friends.

Perhaps there really is some sort of criminal conspiracy — but what? This all would be idle — not to mention unfounded — speculation if it wasn't for the leaders of the greek community acting as though they were secret agents working for the CIA or MI6.

The leaders of the greek community need to wake up and realize that, by acting as though they are above everyone else, they are destroying the system they thought they were working to protect.

Elian editorial inaccurate on several critical points

Editor,
Your fairly well-written editorial decrying the handling of Elian Gonzalez's seizure was brief and concise. I would like to be equally brief in commenting on a few of your points, notably the warrant and the blame surrounding Juan Miguel Gonzalez.

The warrant to extricate Elian exists and is valid. But the method and intention behind the warrant should alarm us as citizens. Normally, warrants are not issued for anything other than inanimate objects, and they normally are issued for searching or seizing people. But the 11th Circuit Court of Appeals specifically denied a request for a court order to get the boy.

Why, then, did Deputy Attorney General Eric Holder say they did not need a court order to perform the seizure? If they did not need the court order, why did they request one from the court?

The administration knew they could not act without a piece of paper legitimizing the forced entry. A warrant then was obtained, signed by a lower-level magistrate, with the text, "concealed person," referring to Elian in the body of the warrant. Elian was not concealed. The entire world, courtesy of the media, knew precisely where Elian was 24 hours a day. Since the words "concealed person" are required in the text of a search warrant, and everyone knew Elian was not concealed, the administration's intentions are revealed: to get the boy back to Cuba no matter what the cost. In a sense, they defied the court and the intention of their ruling with their heavy-handed tactics.

Also in your editorial, you state that "Juan Miguel has done nothing to make the situation better." This statement implies Elian's father has the capacity to speak freely.

He does not. Cuban DGI agents (the Cuban equivalent of the Soviet KGB) constantly surround Juan Miguel.

Reports from Cuba say Juan Miguel's parents and other relatives are under house arrest. I even have seen two reports referring to Juan Miguel's other children and Elian's sister kept in Cuba as well, but these remain unconfirmed by the news media. Because coercion and manipulation are intrinsic characteristics of Marxist/Stalinist regimes, we safely can assume Fidel Castro is speaking through Juan Miguel, and not Juan Miguel himself.

The point is, why? Why is the administration so eager to return the boy?

Why not allow the appeals process to proceed? Why is the entire topic now shifting to whether the Cuban embargo is necessary?

It is these questions that need to be answered in order to fully understand the motivations of those who ultimately control Elian's destiny.

Gay issues, diversity education discussed in dialogue series

KELLY GLASSCOCK/COLLEGIAN

Latasha Reed, sophomore in biology, was the Diversity Dialogue facilitator at the dialogue for gay issues meeting Thursday evening in the Hemisphere room in Hale library. Anyone was welcome to attend the gathering to take part in the discussion.

By TAMARA MANN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Education concerning diversity issues was the main topic of Wednesday's Diversity Dialogue series discussion.

"Our main goal is to educate others and ourselves. These dialogue discussions are trying to do that. We want to be as visible as possible, and let people know more about what we do," said Sarah Bailey, president of Queer Straight Alliance, panel member and senior in speech.

A panel of four members led the discussion on gay issues and multiculturalism during the dialogue.

Latasha Reed, dialogue facilitator and sophomore in biology, said gay issues are not frequently touched upon in the Midwest. She said it is good to have an opportunity to open a dialogue and talk about gay issues.

Molly Royle, coordinator of multicultural library services, said diversity today is defined by broad terms. She said that too often diversity is limited strictly to the terms of traditional diversity topics, but they would like to work to expand that definition to incorporate things such as gay issues, religion, women's issues and people who have physical disabilities.

"With these panels and similar events, we want to make sure we are working to build a coalition of support to get away from defining multiculturalism in terms of the traditional topics and aim diversity as being something that affects everyone," said Heath Harding, QSA vice president, panel member and College of Education employee.

Some of the issues discussed at the dialogue concerned K-State's non-discrimination policy and Kansas laws, or in some panel members' opinions, the lack of laws, concerning domestic partner benefits and sexual orientation laws in Kansas.

"Discrimination is discrimination, no matter what form," Reed said. "It seems many laws are enacted that protect racial, harassment or other similar forms of discrimination, but it seems that sexual orientation laws are the last to be enacted, if at all."

Another topic of discussion detailed panel and audience members' views about how to eliminate discrimination.

Bailey said a lot of times there is a fine line drawn between how to get rid of discrimination.

"Are you going to go at it from a law standpoint, promoting implementation of laws, or do you focus upon a movement, changing people's minds through education?" she said. "This is similar to the same type of things they dealt with during the civil rights era."

People are working on gay rights from both levels, Bailey said. There are people working at the local and state levels, and there's all kinds of things going on at the federal level, she said.

"I think you have to approach it from both levels," she said. "You've got to push from all angles, or you will miss groups of people."

Also addressing solutions to eliminate discrimination, Carla Jones, panel member and assistant dean of student life, brought up a previous issue where religious issues played a big role.

She said she was in charge of bringing in a speaker to talk about gay issues at a previous job. During the talk, audience members left to get their Bibles. When they returned, everything the speaker attempted to address was contradicted by scripture.

"I think that until you are able to change the mindframe that accepting homosexuality is going against one's religion, it will be hard to diminish discrimination," Jones said.

A concern for many panel and audience members was where QSA should fit in on campus — as part of or an affiliate of the multicultural office, and whether it is considered a multicultural organization by the administration and other organizations.

Bailey said she thinks QSA has experienced situations where communication and coverage of the organization's purposes has been inadequately dealt with.

She said that many times her group is unaware of opportunities or events concerning diversity, and it is frustrating when QSA constantly has to ask organizers to be included.

"I want my allies to work for me and not have to stand up and make sure we're included because not everyone considers QSA to be a multicultural organization," she said.

Publications such as the Collegian and Royal Purple were named during the dialogue for not treating multicultural organizations fairly.

"The Collegian does a poor job of adequately covering multicultural events. Neak Frasty was one of the largest events to be held in Bramlage this year, bringing in over 3,000 people, and it wasn't even reported in the paper," Reed said.

Senate votes to allocate money to safety program in final meeting this semester

By TANNER EHMKE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Student Senate voted 46-3-1 Thursday to allocate $7,646.72 to the Wildcat Walk Escort Program in its final meeting of the school year.

The escort program is designed to help students by providing an escort to accompany them through campus or to their homes upon request.

The program serves a six-block radius around campus.

"The program has a lot of merit, but the cost per walk in my mind has been too high," Engineering Sen. Joe Pacey said.

"The cost has been too high since the group's inception," he said.

Pacey said he figured the program costs about $12 per escort, with the program giving about 640 walks per year.

The cost, he said, was too high in comparison to other forms of service, such as taxis.

"We have to look at either decreasing allocation per year, or increasing the usage," Pacey said.

"Either way, something has to be changed."

However, Arts and Sciences Sen. Jill Szynskie said she disagreed.

"Even if we have one walk all year, it's still worth it," Szynskie said. "We're saving a life and keeping students out of danger."

Szynskie, member of the Allocations Committee, argued the program also is a tremendous selling point for the university. Szynskie said the entire university sees the benefits, and the program is not the only beneficiary, as all of the students on campus can be safe.

Eliminating the program and replacing it with police staff would be even more expensive, Engineering Sen. Carlton Getz said.

Hiring an officer would be exponentially more expensive, he said.

"On a relative basis, we're getting a deal," he said.

Student Body President Jake Worcester also said he believes it is a valuable program.

"There's been some questions about its efficiency, but they're making improvements and keeping costs down," Worcester said. "We have to be responsible with students' money. This program provides safety to the university."

Of the $48,420.72 allocated at the meeting, the bulk of the money distributed went to the Agriculture Competition Teams, which received $25,000 for the next school year, up about 25 percent from the previous year.

"The teams are extremely valuable to the university," Worcester said. "Teams such as the Livestock Judging Team, who consistently win national titles, show the strength of the program. All of the teams are fantastic additions to K-State."

Three ways to beat the high cost of college.

1. The Montgomery GI Bill
2. Student loan repayment
3. Part-time income

The Army Reserve Alternate Training Program is a smart way to pay for college.

First, if you qualify, the Montgomery GI Bill can provide you with over $7,000 for current college expenses or approved vo/tech training.

Second, if you have—or obtain—a qualified student loan not in default, you may get it paid off at the rate of 15% per year or $1,500, whichever is greater, up to a maximum of $10,000. Selected military skills can double that maximum.

Third, you can earn part-time money in college, and here's how it works: One summer you take Basic Training, and the next summer you receive skill training at an Army school. You'll earn over $1,600 for Basic and even more for skill training. Then you'll attend monthly meetings at an Army Reserve unit near your college, usually one weekend a month plus two weeks a year. You'll be paid over $107 a weekend to start. It's worth thinking about. Give us a call: 539-7243

Cats win 5-0 in 1st round of Big 12 tourney

By DEREK BOSS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It's been K-State's performance in doubles throughout the spring tennis season, that often has determined the match's outcome.

However, Thursday proved to be a different scenario for the Wildcats.

In K-State's 5-0 first-round victory over 12th-seed Missouri at the 2000 Big 12 Women's Tennis Championships, the Cats' doubles tandems didn't even have to take the court.

In fact, the team's quick start in singles action decided the match before doubles play was set to begin.

At the Plaza Tennis Center in Kansas City, Mo., fifth-seed K-State (13-8) won its first five singles matches of the afternoon to eliminate the Tigers (4-15) without having to finish the No. 6 singles match or compete in doubles play.

"We've lost our last few close matches, and we knew we had to start off strong today," senior Anna Pampoulova said. "We got off to a really good start, and it gave us some confidence."

Pampoulova was one of three Cat tennis players pacing the squad to victory, as K-State lost just seven games in its top-three singles matches.

The junior defeated Caitlin Thompson at No. 3 singles, 6-1, 6-2, while sophomore Alena Jecminkova and freshman Petra Sedlmajerova also won in straight sets at No. 1 and 2 singles, respectively.

"We played awfully well today considering the conditions — with the wind and dropping temperatures," head coach Steve Bietau said Thursday following the Cat win. "We wanted a convincing win today and we got it. It is a good step and we will add a little bit more tomorrow."

The victory over Mizzou places No. 48 K-State in today's 11 a.m. second-round matchup against fourth-seed Oklahoma State.

Bietau said the Cats are eager to get a rematch with the Cowboys after K-State's less-than-stellar outing against OSU on April 9.

In fact, it was the Cowboys who snapped the Cats' perfect 7-0 start to the conference season, and in turn, sent K-State into a four-game losing skid heading into the Big 12 Tournament.

"We are looking forward to another shot with Oklahoma State," Bietau said. "They beat us 7-2 in Manhattan, but this time we will have different matchups."

K-State's triumph over the Tigers assured the Cats' winningest season since 1990, when Bietau's squad won 14 matches.

The victory also improves K-State's all-time Big 12 Tournament record to 2-3.

Basketball team signs point guard

■ Daryl Williams joins KSU from Florida school.

By NICK BRATKOVIC
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State men's basketball team added another player into the fold Thursday by announcing the signing of Daryl Williams, a transfer point guard from Pasco-Hernando Community College in New Port Richey, Fla.

K-State head Jim Wooldridge described him as a great all-around player.

"I think he is a good player. He's a jack of all trades — he's got a good feel for the game and is a good defender," Wooldridge said.

Williams is a 6-foot-5-inch guard who averaged 17.2 points per game, 6.1 rebounds, 5.4 assists and 2.5 steals last season. With those statistics, he led the Conquistadors to a 27-3 record, and it finished with a No. 12 ranking in the final NJCAA poll.

He also scored a career-high 31 points and had 17 rebounds against Palm Beach Community College in leading the Conquistadors to the Sun Coast Conference Championship.

Wooldridge said that after the team signed Larry Reid, a 6-foot point guard, the team began looking for more quality players.

"We went into this recruiting period wanting to get good players that were available," Wooldridge said.

In addition to Reid, the school also has signed 6-foot-6-inch guard Jason Robinson from Seward County Community College, and E.J. Harris from Crenshaw High School in Los Angeles earlier this year.

Wooldridge said the school still is working the recruiting trail and possible recruits.

Receiver Morgan predicts upcoming season's passing game to be

'BOOM-BOOM-BOOM'

By RICHARD SMITH
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

As track stars go, Aaron Lockett would be considered pretty fast. The 5-foot-7-inch, 160-pound speedster qualified for the NCAA Indoor Track and Field Championships last year with a time of 6.71 seconds in the 60-meter dash.

As football players go, Lockett's speed is stunning. No one on the K-State squad can touch his 4.24 speed in the 40-yard dash, and few others on a national level could equal it.

Lockett's fleet feet have helped establish him as one of the Big 12's premier receivers, as evidenced by his second-team All Big 12 selection last year. He is the sort of player capable of driving opposing defensive coordinators to early retirement.

But Lockett isn't the only person who keeps opposing coaches up through many sleepless autumn nights. No, the thought that truly will raise the blood pressure of opposing coaches next year is that Lockett isn't even the scariest receiver on his own team.

That honor goes to senior Quincy Morgan. Morgan, a community-college transfer, made an impression last season in his first year as a starter, amassing 44 catches, 1,007 yards and a Big 12-record tying nine touchdowns, while setting a Big 12 record with his 24 yard-per-catch average and earning first-team All-Big 12 honors.

"Our wide receivers are strong," K-State offensive coordinator Ron Hudson said. "I mean, really strong."

Taken together, Morgan, Lockett, senior Martez Wesley, junior Brandon Clark and senior George Williams combine to make wide receiver the most lethal position in what should be a greatly improved K-State offense this season. So far during spring practice, Morgan said the talent of the receiving corps has been evident.

"It's clicking. It's clicking well now," Morgan said. "People saw a lot of big plays and a lot of sloppiness last season. This season it will be more of a 'boom-boom-boom' type of passing game."

The Cats hope to mix in more short passes to keep the offense moving and keep defenses from looking for the long ball. While it might be tough to imagine Lockett and Morgan trumping last season's acrobatics, the possibility still exists. A year of experience working with each other and quarterback Jonathan Beasley should bring the Wildcat passing game a new crispness and efficiency this season.

"I know where (the receivers) are going to be, so I can get rid of the ball," Beasley said. "If they're running an 'out,' I know what step they're going to break on so I can throw it a couple steps ahead, and when they turn their head, the ball is right there."

Of course, timing and accuracy aren't strictly necessary when throwing for the athletic Morgan. His blend of a big 6-foot-2-inch frame and sub-4.5 40-yard dash speed make him capable of going a long way every time he touches the ball. After regularly bullying and outjumping defenders to turn potential interceptions into catches last season, Morgan said he plans to be even more selfish with the football in 2000.

"If it's somewhere in the area, I'm going to think that I can get to it and hopefully catch it," Morgan said. "I'll try to make big plays."

While hauling in 77 receptions for 1,459 yards and nine touchdowns over the past two seasons, Lockett has accumulated experience and demonstrated big play ability. Now his task is to bring consistency to his game.

"I kind of know what's going on — this is my third spring ball," Lockett said. "I'm just trying to work on staying consistent and helping the quarterback."

It appears the Wildcats consistently will see good play from their wide receivers this year, no matter which ones are on the field. The reserves include Williams, who averaged more than 25 yards per catch in finishing third on the squad in receiving last year; Clark, a speedy 6-foot-3-inch target who hopes to rebound from an injury-plagued sophomore year; and Wesley, who has shown a knack for playmaking in two seasons of spot duty.

With a talented group of targets at his disposal,

Beasley, for one, said he thinks the K-State passing game can reach new heights this season.

"We can be as good as we want to be," he said. "If we go out there with the mindset that no one can stop us, and just go out there and do things like we do in practice and move the ball, we've got a great chance."

Sportswriters' predictions increase publication sales, win readers despite constant inaccuracies

Let me be brief and to the point: we don't have the faintest clue about predicting sports.

When I say we, I mean the entire sportswriting community. Sure, it would be easy to discount sportswriters at the collegiate level, but let's face it: no sportswriter at any level can claim to possess psychic intuition when it comes to predicting sporting events.

No one in the industry escapes this fate. From Mel Kiper Jr. to Peter Gammons to even the humble Jason Whitlock, sportswriters constantly are eating their words, only to serve up more "expert analysis" the very next week. I'm not exempt from this, either. As a naive freshman in spring 1997, I decided to bless the sports reading community with my insight on the Big 12 men's basketball tournament.

After five minutes of in-depth research which basically amounted to finding out just which 12 teams were in the conference, I decided Tyrone Lue and Nebraska was my upset special.

Never mind that Kansas owned the tournament up to this point. I was confident the Huskers would prove me right. After the Big Red checked out faster than Myron Piggie's NCAA credibility and KU repeated as champs, I decided to hold off on the prediction columns for a while.

The only reason I'm reveling in the sportswriter's own black hole is due to the newest issue of ESPN The Magazine. I have many issues with the sports network's print offspring, but the cover story was the perfect example of the wrath that ensues when sportswriters' egos and outlandish predictions combine.

Plastered over the mug of Toronto Raptors guard/phenom Vince Carter is the heading, "Must see VC: Will Vince Carter save the playoffs?" Mind you, this is only Carter's second year in the NBA. Factor in Sunday's 3-for-20 performance in a 92-88 loss to the New York Knicks, and you realize it might be too early to anoint Carter the savior of the NBA postseason.

It won't stop ESPN or any of the other sports publications, though, from throwing their press passes in the ring and making another wild prediction with no fear of the repercussions.

Even Sports Illustrated, the sports fans' last resort for quality reporting, slips up from time to time. Prior to the NCAA Tournament, SI decided to take a new approach to sorting through March Madness and announced who wouldn't make the Final Four.

After expanding on each team, the magazine decided LSU and Illinois would remain standing after four rounds of play. Of course, the Tigers and the Illini exited in the second round, proving that even the great minds of America don't have a clue when it comes providing a "sure thing" in sports.

This is nothing but a cry that will fall on deaf ears. Even though sports gurus continue to prove themselves wrong by picking teams such as Arizona or Penn State to win the college football championship, fans continue to beg for more. It's like boy bands: No matter how many times we've witnessed their demise due to, well, lack of real talent, preadolescent girls and Tiger Beat magazine always will be there to shell out money and attention.

So buy that publication offering 50 reasons why the Boston Red Sox will win the World Series this year. Spare a moment of your life to investigate why someone from Hofstra is a "lock" to be drafted in the second round of the NFL Draft. In the end, your method for calculating who will win the Stanley Cup is as good as Barry Melrose's.

Still, sources tell me this is the year of the St. Louis Blues. Oh crap, never mind.

Track season coming to end

By MICHAEL NOLL
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The number of meets yet to come before the Big 12 and National Championship meets is dwindling, with only four weeks remaining in the outdoor track season.

The next round of meets include the Drake Relays in Des Moines, Iowa, and the UMKC meet this weekend. Both meets will include some of the final tinkering before the conference championships, said K-State assistant Track and Field Coach Randy Cole.

The sprinters, distance runners and high jumpers will be at work starting today at Drake. Business will not be as usual for the distance runners, though, as the women's shuttle hurdle medley and sprint medley will compete for the first time this season. The women's distance medley relay also will run for the first time since taking third at the indoor championships.

The change of pace should make the meet more interesting for the runners, Cole said.

"It will be fun and exciting for these people to do something a little different," Cole said. "The women will have their hands full in the distance medley with Stanford, who is the national champion in that event."

The women's distance runners will have the opportunity to continue proving themselves in the open events. Korene Hinds will run in the 1,500 meters, an event in which she is ranked 10th nationally, and superstar freshman Amy Mortimer, second nationally in the 3,000 meters, will add a few thousand meters to her stride with the 5,000 meters.

As has been common this season, all the women's distance runners are expected to perform well despite a rigorous training regimen, Cole said.

"The last three or four weeks, they have combined consistent hard training with good meets," Cole said. "They try to race well, but they're not completely fresh. That says a lot about their consistency and their natural talent. They've just scratched the surface of what they are able to do."

On the men's side of the middle-distance events, Istvan Nagy, who just finished third in the 800 meters at the Kansas Relays with a time of 1:50.20, should compete well, Cole said.

"Istvan is coming on in the 800," Cole said. "It will be a great opportunity in the open 800 to knock on the door to get an NCAA qualifying time."

While the majority of the runners are at Drake, the throwers will be several hundred miles away in Kansas City, Mo. Drake might be a more prestigious meet, but the facilities at UMKC are more conducive to throwing events. As a result, the throwers will have a terrific chance to improve, Cole said.

One thrower on the rim of gaining an NCAA automatic qualifying mark is shot putter Rebekah Green, who already has earned a provisional mark with a throw of 50 feet, 4 inches at Emporia, Cole said.

"She is on the door of putting it all together," Cole said. "She just needs to not think about throwing it a mile when she's capable of throwing it a long way. She doesn't need to kill it."

The entire throwing squad should do well, not only at UMKC but also at the conference championships, Cole said.

"I could see them scoring well at the conference meet," Cole said. "Traditionally, K-State has had good representation in the throwing events."

Cats to end road-game series in Missouri

By SAM STIERS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State's baseball team (16-24, 3-17 Big 12) will end its seven-game road trip this weekend with a three-game series against Missouri (27-17, 8-10 Big 12).

The Cats travel to Columbia, Mo., to play their first game at 7 p.m. today. They also will play at 2 p.m. Saturday, and the series finale will be at 1 p.m. Sunday.

Missouri has won five of its last six games and now are 10 games over .500. The Tigers are coming off a 7-4 win over Southwest Missouri State.

"Missouri is a solid ball club. They pitch extremely well," Mike Clark, K-State head coach, said. "They use the running game well — they're a hit-and-run type ball club, but the main thing is that their pitchers throw strikes and have command of the strike zone."

K-State has struggled recently, losing four games in a row, and are in last place in the Big 12.

"The team's confidence is a little shaken," Clark said. "Our pitchers have done a good job for us though during the losses. We just have to pick it up offensively."

Clark said he didn't know who would start today's opening game. He said Chad Duckers will start Saturday and Jason Wells will start Sunday's game.

"Our pitching has been good. We've been solid out of the bullpen, and our guys are throwing well,"

FILE PHOTO BY MIKE SHEPHERD/COLLEGIAN
K-State second baseman Chad Tabor throws to first to retire a William Woods' baserunner in a 15-2 rout of Woods on April 19 in Manhattan. The Wildcats start a three-game series today at Missouri.

Clark said.

K-State's pitching staff will have to find a way to stop sophomore Ryan Stegall, who is the Tigers' most potent offensive weapon. Stegall is the team's starting shortstop and leads the team with a .391 batting average.

He leads the team in total bases with 109 and in RBIs with 50. Stegall also is the Tigers' closer. He is 2-1 with 9 saves and a 4.50 ERA.

"They have a great shortstop in Stegall," Clark said. "He is a great offensive player and a very good defensive player, too."

The Tigers have scored 300 runs on the year, while giving up 257 runs.

K-State's offense has struggled during the last four games. Clark said the Cats have not done a good job of moving runners around the bases.

"Offensively, we've not played well," Clark said. "We need to get our bats going again. We haven't been able to get key base hits when we need them. Once we get someone on base we're just not executing."

Missouri is coached by Tim Jamieson, who is in his 6th season as the Tigers' head coach, and in the past four seasons he has led the team to more than 30 wins.

"You're only as good as your next ball game," Clark said. "It's time for us to put some things together and get a winning streak going. It has to start with one game."

Residence hall concert to benefit local Boys and Girls Club

BY TARYN FORT
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The games will begin at 11 a.m. Saturday on the lawn outside Haymaker Hall. At noon, the first of several bands will take the stage at the third-annual Haylapalooza.

Haylapalooza benefits a different philanthropy every year, with this year's theme being "Be the Change." All proceeds from the event will go to the Manhattan Boys and Girls Club.

"This is the largest K-State residence-hall sponsored event," said Zac Collins, freshman in anthropology and Haymaker Hall Governing Board president. "Haylapalooza has been on our calendar for the entire year, but extensive planning has been taking place for the last six months.

"Every year, Haymaker selects a different philanthropy that will benefit from Haylapalooza. Since the Boys and Girls Club is relatively new to Manhattan, we thought this would be a good way for them to get their feet into the ground."

Haylapalooza was started three years ago by a hall president who decided some sort of relaxing and non-stressful day was needed before finals week.

"We are fully sponsored by several Manhattan businesses who have donated food and gifts to use for prizes," said Orlando Velez, freshman in architecture and Haymaker historian. "The games will begin at 11 in the morning, and the bands will begin playing at 12. Children from the Boys and Girls Club will be attending, so the entire day is basically an all-ages event."

Games are scheduled for the entire day, and several well-known local bands are participating in Haylapalooza.

"The games are ranging from fruit softball to water-balloon volleyball to an eating contest and even a destruction game where you will just get to destroy things," Velez said. "Some of the games will cost around $2, and some are free. The T-shirts that we are selling can even be tie-dyed by whomever buys one."

Food and drinks will be provided by Derby Dining Center.

"Derby is sponsoring what is called a food exchange, where students can just get their ID cards swiped for their lunch or dinner," Collins said. "Anyone who does not live in the dorms can just go to Derby and pay for their meal beforehand and they will also be allowed to have their cards swiped."

A different band will be playing every hour beginning at noon until sundown.

"We have a strong venue for Haylapalooza this year," said Brandon Kidwell, freshman in political science and Haymaker chief justice. "The Fools will be taking the stage at 12 p.m., and Ruskabank, who has participated in the past, will be the final show of the day. We are hoping that with all of these well-known local bands will be a major priority for the attendees this year."

Collins said the event is free to attend, but he hopes funds will be raised through T-shirt sales.

"There is no cost to simply attend Haylapalooza for the music, but that we are hoping that people will buy T-shirts since that money is what will be going to benefit the Boys and Girls Club," Collins said.

"Haymaker Hall has spent over band schedule

- The Fools — 12 p.m.
- Seldom la Hero — 1 p.m.
- Sickened — 2 p.m.
- The Egomaniacs — 3 p.m.
- Phat Albert — 4 p.m.
- Binge — 5 p.m.
- Crooked Pinky — 6 p.m.
- Beggars Table — 7 p.m.
- Gully Jumpers — 8 p.m.
- Ruskabank — 9 p.m.

$4,000 on this event, and we have high hopes for a successful day. Whether it rains or shines, this event will take place."

Scholarship houses to sponsor Jell-O Wrestling to help charity

■ Tournament proceeds to aid local Big Brothers and Big Sisters chapter.

BY KRISTEN DYMACEK
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Instead of the usual mat in a school gym, an outside pit full of 90 gallons of blue Jell-O will be the venue for wrestling matches this weekend.

The Smurthwaite Leadership and Scholarship House and Smith Scholarship House are sponsoring Jell-O Wrestling at 3:30 p.m.

Saturday. Stephanie Higgins, Smurthwaite resident, said the event, which is open to anyone, will be on the front lawn of Smurthwaite, diagonal from Haymaker Hall, from 3:30 p.m. until the Jell-O disintegrates.

"We're charging $1 per person for each minute of wrestling," Higgins, sophomore in speech communications, said. "It might sound expensive, but in reality, the time goes slowly in the Jell-O pit, and the entertainment is worth the cost."

Higgins said donations also are being accepted, with all proceeds going to Big Brothers and Big Sisters of Manhattan Inc..

Adam Springer, Smith resident, said the Big Brothers and Big Sisters organization was chosen because it has been the Smith philanthropy in the past.

"It's a good organization to support," Springer, junior in horticulture, said.

Higgins said both houses think community service is an important part of college life.

"Our main goal is to focus on the surrounding Manhattan community," she said. "We thought this would be a great way to help them and relieve the stress of students during the upcoming finals at the same time."

Participants will be wrestling in a large pit surrounded by hay bales.

"The Jell-O will be ankle deep," Higgins said. "Just enough to get messy."

Russell Shipley, Smith resident, said the matches will follow regular wrestling rules but will follow safety rules as well.

"We'll have a referee. There will be two points for takedowns, reversals, things like that," Shipley, sophomore in accounting, said.

"We'll also have penalties."

There will be a time limit for each match, but participants can wrestle as many times as they want.

Higgins said even though there will be an official and rules, the Jell-O wrestling is not a competition and prizes will not be awarded.

"This event is just supposed to be a fun time that benefits a good cause," she said.

Before wrestling, Higgins said participants will be required to sign a waiver. People younger than 18 years of age will need to have their parents' signature before wrestling.

Even though a hose will be provided to help clean off, Springer said participants are encouraged to bring towels and wear old shorts and T-shirts.

"You want to make sure you wear something that won't matter if it gets dirty," he said.

Participants also are encouraged to bring friends to wrestle, but people will be available in case someone doesn't have a partner.

"It doesn't matter if you know the person or not," Higgins said. "Just tumbling around in Jell-O is enough to bring a smile to your face."

The Tony Award-winning musical, "Company," will be performed by a cast of local community members and K-State students, Friday-Sunday and May 4-7 at the Manhattan Arts Center.

The 1970 musical, by Stephen Sondheim, is known for its humorous outlook on relationships and marriages. The musical focuses on the lives of five married couples in New York.

Fran Albright, director of the musical, said she thinks people will have a new experience viewing "Company" because it is different from most musicals.

"This musical discusses things that are relevant to people such as relationships, love and marriage," she said. "It gives people something to discuss after the show."

Charles Faulk, musical director, said he loves the songs and music in the show because Sondheim doesn't follow the same path as previous songwriters.

"He speaks of other emotions besides love and hate," Faulk said. "The music is full of wonderful wit and sparkling metaphors."

Faulk said the cast has 14 members; half are students and the rest are Manhattan locals.

"This is the best talent I've ever had on stage. It's going to be an excellent show," he said.

Faulk said he has directed the music for other performances at the arts center, but that he is excited to be doing this particular one.

"I have always wanted to do 'Company,'" he said.

Sarah Kuhns, senior in music theater, is playing the role of Amy.

"Amy is the neurotic character—she's 31 and getting married for the first time," Kuhns said. "The man she's going to marry is sweet and wonderful, but she's having cold feet."

Kuhns said she auditioned for the show not having a particular character in mind.

"I am happy with this role, but there are lots of good characters, and I would have been willing to play any of them," she said.

Although she has performed in 15 different shows in Manhattan and the surrounding area, Kuhns said she is excited about this performance.

"I'm a senior, and I'm graduating," she said. "So I am excited because this is my last Manhattan show."

Anna Bolz, sophomore in music theater, will portray Susan.

"Susan is a sweet little Southern girl who is happy to be divorcing her husband," Bolz said. "They are still happy with each other, but are looking forward to the divorce."

Bolz said the biggest challenge for her has been trying to achieve a consistent southern accent.

Bolz has performed in plays at K-State, but this is her first show at the arts center. She said she really likes the cast.

"I love this cast. Everyone's really good. It's a very high-quality cast," she said.

The cast is more than ready for opening night, Albright said.

"I think we're where we need to be," she said. "We're nervous, but it's the right kind of nervous where you can't wait for the first show."

Albright said she encourages people to attend and see the local talent.

"I think it's going to surprise people that we have so many people with great voices," she said. "This cast is incredibly talented."

Marvelous 3, PodStar to play at Memorial tonight

By SHANNON DELMEZ
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

Marvelous 3, a band that was started as a tribute to '80s rock and took off from there, will play at 7 tonight at Memorial Stadium.

Neil Gustafson, tour manager for Marvelous 3, said the band is different from other bands because it has a unique performing style.

"They're a live show," he said. "They jump around and act silly for an hour and a half."

Butch Walker, lead singer and guitarist for Marvelous 3, said people connect with the band because it connects with the audience. It provides a show that goes back to rock shows of the 70s and 80s.

"I think the main reason people connect with us live is because we grew up through the 70s and 80s when rock shows meant something," he said. "We've been able to provide an entertaining show with the house lights up, and that's it. The one thing we've always tried to do is connect with the audience."

"One thing that Marvelous 3 fans like is that they know when they come they are going to be involved with the show. They aren't going to be just played to, they are going to be played with. People love that."

The show is being sponsored by Union Program Council, which also is bringing in PodStar, a local Manhattan band, to open for Marvelous 3.

"As we were looking through, we came up with our dream list," said Aaron Sefton, UPC Eclectic Entertainment chairman. "We narrowed it down to three choices, and after contacting agents, Marvelous 3 was our best option. We thought that they would turn out a big crowd."

Marvelous 3 will play songs from "Hey Album," which produced two hit singles, "Freak of the Week," and "Every Monday." The group also will play some of its songs from its new album, "Ready, Sex, Go," which is due in stores this summer, Gustafson said.

Matt Scheck, former UPC eclectic entertainment chairman, said UPC is expecting a large crowd despite ticket sales.

"Ticket sales are kind of slow right now," he said. "But we feel, with it being an outdoor show, that a lot of students will just show up the day of the event and buy them at the door."

He said he hoped PodStar also would help to bring in a crowd.

"PodStar is a pop/rock band located here in Manhattan. The members go to Manhattan High School. They are very familiar to the Manhattan scene," Scheck said. "When we were selecting bands to open for Marvelous 3, we were trying to think of bands in this area that could help draw a large crowd. We know that they're very popular with high school kids as well as the students here."

PodStar will open at 7 p.m., and Marvelous 3 will begin its show at 9. Sefton said Marvelous 3 not only provides good music, but a wonderful stage show, too.

"They've just got so much stage presence," Sefton said. "They do a lot of tricks. They'll throw their pick up, and the guitarist will be playing, and then he'll hit it off his guitar and catch it in his mouth and still be playing, never missing a note. It makes it an awesome visual thing, as well as an awesome audio show."

The Marvelous 3 show is about big harmony and big guitars, which is like the music of the '80s, Walker said.

"That's what makes our show so much fun, is that you're going to leave sweating and having a good time and not taking life too seriously, which is what rock and roll was put on this planet in the

Ell's our No. 2 and Jeremy Milne's our No. 3.

"It is competitive enough now that I don't know that there is anything that could happen between now and the end of spring practice that would alter the depth chart. By the same token, I think things that take place over the summer and during two-a-days, will make it even more competitive."

Snyder said Beasley's performance has afforded him the right to be the team's current No. 1 quarterback.

"Jonathan has earned the right, not because of what he did last fall, but what he has done in the spring. He has earned the right to stay in the No. 1 spot."

In addition to the quarterback battle, Snyder said the team is on a quest for chemistry.

"Well, it's been good and not so good. What hasn't been so good about it is, I don't think we've achieved all the things that we've set out to achieve, and specifically trying to bring this program together and developing the continuity from the players interacting with other players."

K-State fullback Johnno Lazetich said he believes the team has come together nicely.

"Black, white, purple — our team has one goal and that is to win," Lazetich said.

Injuries, Snyder said, have hurt the Cats' ability to develop chemistry, particularly on the offensive line. The Cats now plan to use a rotation of players, and Thomas Barnett is not among them.

"If Thomas were in our program, it definitely would alter a lot of things, it gives you one more player and how you mix and match, change as many as three people," Snyder said. "There's still some other issues that don't revolve around football."

Injuries have slowed some of the players' progress. He said spring ball is such a compressed period of time with only 15 practices that if a player gets dinged up, it is difficult for him to come back.

However, Snyder said the staff has had the opportunity to get some additional work with younger players on both sides of the ball. On the defensive side, the spring game will be an opportunity for the K-State coaching staff to find some playmakers who can make fans put names like Mark Simoneau, Darren Howard and Lamar Chapman in the back of their minds.

"We'd certainly like to identify playmakers, so to speak, address the loss of some very, very fine players and those kind of young guys that could make special plays for you. I don't think we have done that. It doesn't mean where not playing well, that's not the case."

He also said the linebacker position is one with which the staff is pleased.

"We still have a ways to go, but we feel comfortable with the group we are working with," Snyder said.

He also said no player has really jumped out at him.

"There hasn't been anybody to really knock your socks off."

"I should only say entrances. We don't want anyone to exit," he said.

"Well, maybe that wouldn't work." Levin said Varney's will be expanding the apparel and souvenir department and the art and technical supplies.

"One thing we're adding that we haven't really had is fine stationary," he said.

An elevator also will be a new feature to Varney's for anyone who can't use the stairs, Levin said.

The mural that greets people on the outside of the old theater will not remain.

"Unfortunately, that will come down," he said. "It's served its purpose, kind of spruced up the area."

Walter said there will be some surprises for customers when renovations are finished, but he wouldn't comment on what they were.

"The plans have changed about six times," he said.

Whatever the surprises are, Walter said Varney's will look a lot different when students come back in August.

"I think the whole store will be a more enjoyable shopping experience," he said.

Government reported that women receive an average of $17,000 less per year than men in similar positions.

Philp has served as principal of Northview Elementary for the past five years, and has been involved in education for the past 25 years.

"In Kansas I've always believed that leadership options were more readily available," Philp said.

In Manhattan-Ogden USD 383 and Geary County schools, there is a higher ratio of female elementary school principals than male elementary school principals, Philp said. Manhattan also has a female Chamber of Commerce president, and the superintendent of Geary County schools is a woman as well.

"Some significant changes have occurred in the role of women in the work force throughout the last century," Philp said. "I want girls to know they are capable of making similar changes if they continue to look beyond what's available to them now."

Poll indicates picks for female vice president

By LAURENCE ARNOLD
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Former presidential candidate Elizabeth Dole was the choice over New Jersey Gov. Christie Whitman among Republicans, and Sen. Dianne Feinstein of California and Maryland Lt. Gov. Kathleen Kennedy Townsend were the top Democrats in a poll measuring public interest in a female vice president.

The poll was conducted by the White House Project, a nonprofit group urging the election of women to top national posts.

Dole received 58 percent of Republican support to 18 percent for Whitman. Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison of Texas finished third with 10 percent.

Feinstein received 24 percent of Democratic support to 23 percent for Townsend. Rep. Maxine Waters of California finished third with 16 percent.

"Our goal is a long-term goal," she said. "We're looking way beyond this election. We're looking to 10 years from now having one, two, three, four women" running for president.

Washington pollsters Lake, Snell, Perry & Associates, a Democratic firm, contacted 323 registered Democrats and 238 registered Republicans from March 16 to 19. The margin of error was plus or minus 5.5 percentage points for the Democratic results, 6.4 percentage points for the Republicans.

In addition to commissioning the poll, the White House Project asked Americans to weigh in on 15 possible vice presidential nominees on ballots published in Parade magazine and posted at the group's Web site. Some 17,000 votes were cast over 26 days in that unscientific exercise.

The four women mentioned most often were Dole, Whitman, Feinstein and Lt. Gen. Claudia Kennedy, the Army's highest-ranking female officer. Those four will share the cover of Parade magazine this Sunday.

said she went to class with her mom and typed on the computer with her mother's peers at the Women's Center while Vander Pol took an early final.

"All kids should go to work with their parents," Ashley said. "You get treated real well at work, and kids deserve that."

During her undergraduate coursework at K-State, Vander Pol has been researching the ways girls are discouraged from entering fields such as biology and veterinary medicine.

"I want my daughter and other girls to realize how many options are available to them," Vander Pol said. "I hope I can teach Ashley that the only limits she'll face in pursuing her dreams are the limits she places on herself."

Students face anxieties about living with parents

■ Student intern at UCS offers suggestions, tips for living with parents.

By BROOKE ERICKSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Molly Miller, freshman in secondary education, said there are a few things she's already fearing about going home for the summer after a year on her own at K-State.

"I'm just not looking forward to my parents treating me like a child,"

Miller said. "I'm also not looking forward to having a curfew."

John McMannama, junior in construction science, recalls going home for summers after being away at school.

"It was tough," McMannama said. "My parents and I were on conflicting time schedules. They had to work, and when I would come home late at night, somehow they always managed to be up waiting for me and would get mad."

Michael Maples, a psychology intern for University Counseling

Services at Lafene Student Health Center, said one way to prevent confrontation between students and their parents is open communication.

"Parents and children must not wait for a confrontation to happen before they have open communication," Maples said.

He said he suggests parents and their children make up contracts so there is no misunderstanding of what is expected.

"The hardest thing about going back home is getting your parents to trust you and with that, there is going to have to be some compromises made," he said.

He said students should understand they are once again under their parents' rules and that with those settings, there are expectations they must abide by.

He said students should not challenge their parents, because that might cause them to be more difficult to work with.

"Sometimes when students go home, they are challenging and confrontational with their parents, telling them that they want it a certain way," Maples said. "If they do this, it's only a natural reaction, I think, for a parent to be evoked into having a more restrictive reaction. They might go overboard with putting on restrictions."

Being on one's own for nine months, he said, might have an influence on how parents deal with rules.

"Their kid has had nine months of freedom now," Maples said. "And the parents think if they don't put some kind of restraint on them, they'll be behaving like they did in the residence halls."

One solution Maples had to these problems was that of answering questions when parents ask them.

"Be open and willing to talk about stuff," Maples said. "Share things about your friends, teachers and classes. Your parents aren't trying to be intrusive — they just want to be a part of your life and spend time with you."

Siblings also can be a bump in the road as students try to adjust to living at home again.

Vietnam War anniversary remembered

By GEORGE ESPER
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

HO CHI MINH CITY, Vietnam — An estimated 20,000 people gathered at Reunification Palace to watch celebrations that turned from a military parade into a colorful spring pageant of floats and performers Sunday, the 25th anniversary of the end of the war.

The nationally televised celebrations included goose-stepping soldiers, barefooted minority groups and brightly dressed women parading before a palace decorated with a larger-than-life portrait of legendary communist leader Ho Chi Minh. Eight long banners saluted the victory over the United States and its South Vietnamese allies.

Singers belted out patriotic songs, including one proclaiming: "We are marching to Saigon to liberate our country."

The men who made this day possible were there, including Gen. Vo Nguyen Giap, the architect of victories over both the French and Americans, and Gen. Van Tien Dung, commander of the Ho Chi Minh Campaign that toppled the old non-communist capital of Saigon on April 30, 1975. It was renamed Ho Chi Minh City.

"For what Vietnam and Ho Chi Minh City can enjoy today, the entire nation has paid 30 years of continuous fighting, the loss of millions of human lives and the loss of the most beloved members of millions of families," said Ho Chi Minh City Mayor Vo Viet Thanh.

He also outlined goals for the city that included a higher economic growth rate and less restrictive policies, but warned of problems such as "arbitrary and imperious behavior, wasteful spending, embezzlement, bribery and other social evils."

The song, "Uncle Ho Lives in the Great Victory

Manifesto found in home of man accused in spree

By JEFFREY BAIR
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

PITTSBURGH — The man arrested in a killing spree that left three immigrants, a Jewish woman and a black man dead had a history of mental illness and irrational fears that he was being watched, a former friend and his attorney said Sunday.

Police searching the home where Richard Scott Baumhammers, 34, lived prior to Friday's attacks also found a three-page manifesto indicating he was trying to form a political party opposed to immigration, the Pittsburgh Post-Gazette reported.

The document, which included Baumhammers' signature as "chairman" of The Free Market Party, advocated the rights of European Americans and denounced Third World immigration, according to a prosecution source whom the newspaper didn't name.

"From what I saw and from what I read, it seemed to advocate violence," the source said.

Investigators reconstructing Friday's trail of death said they believe Baumhammers walked into his neighbor's house and fatally shot Anita Gordon, 63, a Jewish interior designer. They believe he then drove to her synagogue and fired at the front doors.

Police say Baumhammers also shot up the doors of another synagogue, shot and wounded one man and killed another at an Indian grocery, killed a Vietnamese delivery driver and a Chinese manager at a restaurant, and gunned down a black man at a suburban karate school. Officers eventually cornered him about 20 miles from the first attack.

Baumhammers has been charged in one death, that of 25-year-old karate student Garry Lee. More charges are expected this week.

Baumhammers' attorney, William Difenderfer, said Sunday that his client has a history of mental illness, though he wouldn't elaborate.

"It is way too early to say anything," he said.

Cabell Francis and his wife, Martha, anxiously awaited their son's appearance through the wooden portion of the track.

The Francis, who were prepared to catch the culmination of Dave Francis's college career on video tape, traveled from Kentucky to witness their son's performance. Cabell said Dave, the team captain for the U.S. Air Force mini baja team, was confident.

Along with 87 other mini baja teams, the Air Force team participated in the Society of Automotive Engineers Mini Baja West 2000 competition Thursday through Saturday. The baja cars, which were powered by Briggs and Stratton 10-horsepower engines, competed at K-State and at the Milford Lake off-road vehicle area.

The team's cars were judged on engineering and design, sales and presentation, cost analysis, acceleration, maneuverability, hill climb and endurance. Penalties were allotted to teams that did not follow various guidelines set for the competition.

Colleges from the United States, Canada and Mexico participated in the event.

David Pacey, K-State's faculty adviser for SAE and coordinator of the competition, said he was pleased with the results of the three K-State teams.

The first K-State team finished with a total score of 806.724, which ranked 11th overall. K-State's second team managed a 17th-place ranking, while K-State-Salina's team, which was a newcomer to the event this year, placed 36th.

"Having an 11th- and 17th-place finish is really remarkable," Pacey said. "It really is the student group who puts it on. All the

Dancers, musicians share culture at International Night

By MICHELLE BERTUGLIA
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Belly dancers and an Irish folk musician might sound like an awkward combination, but these two facets of international culture came together Friday.

Different sounds, tastes, pictures and people from around the world competed for attention at Putnam Hall's annual International Night.

From 6:30 to 8:30 p.m., more than 100 people milled through Putnam's living room looking at artifacts, pictures, clothing and tasting food from 15 different cultures. Tables were set up in a semicircle, and people were invited to stop at each booth and talk to those who had studied, lived in or had a deep cultural heritage invested in the different countries.

Karen Gaffin, Putnam Hall multicultural chairwoman and senior in political science, said Putnam puts on the event every year because it is important for it to bring multicultural and international issues to everyone.

"We hoped that people would come and learn more about the people who they see every day," she said. "As they learn about different cultures indirectly, they are learning and meeting people from all over the world."

Booths were not the only facets of cultural presentation on Friday night.

Jane Saxer, a belly dancer and teacher at a local school, has been belly dancing for a year and a half. She said she began dancing because it looked interesting, and once she began she got hooked. Saxer said items from different cultures like music and dancing are interesting and exotic.

State budget approved by Legislature late Saturday

TOPEKA — Legislators approved a compromise version of the year's last spending bill late Saturday night, after an agreement overcame a hang-up on tobacco-settlement money.

That agreement, between House and Senate negotiators, cleared a path to the Legislature's adjournment.

The Senate began its debate even before members had seen a report on the bill from a joint conference committee. With 10 copies of the report in hand, the vote was 39-0.

A debate in the House followed. Its 102-23 vote sent the bill to Gov. Bill Graves.

"Under the circumstances we began with, we did a pretty good job," said Rep. Richard Reinhardt, D-Erie, a member of the House Appropriations Committee. "This budget is better than I ever thought it would be."

Graves said he hasn't looked at the bill closely enough to know whether he would veto any items in it. He told reporters he is pleased with the legislative session's outcome, especially given the financial problems facing the state.

"The Legislature, collectively, has approached this year in a very responsible way," Graves said.

The negotiators had been stuck on how Kansas should spend its share of the national tobacco settlement. About $30 million was at stake, generally geared toward programs to help children.

The joint conference committee negotiated for three days over the spending bill. Legislative leaders planned to end the session on its 89th calendar day.

After making offer after offer, both sides agreed to put some money toward children's health and education programs and some toward programs designed to reduce the number of young criminal offenders.

One program is directed at students with learning problems to help them avoid the need for special education down the road.

Money originally spent on services for the disabled was shifted to other sources.

House members took issue with two provisions senators added during floor debate Thursday. About $3 million of tobacco money was directed to two teacher programs.

They said such programs were worthy but should be funded by other sources. In the end, senators agreed and removed the programs from tobacco spending.

"We have a good product," said Senate Ways and Means Chairman Dave Kerr, R-Hutchinson, after they reached final agreement.

Legislators already had agreed to some provisions. For example, the bill will permit the state to build what amounts to a maximum-security prison in Topeka for juvenile offenders — at a cost of $34 million.

The bill is the final piece of the $8.78 billion budget for fiscal year 2001, which begins July 1. The final version of the bill should account for between $130 million and $140 million of that total.

Overall state spending would increase by about 1.8 percent from fiscal 2000.

Top female cadet demoted at Citadel in prank incident

CHARLESTON, S.C. — The Citadel's top-ranking female cadet, one of the first women to attend the school, has been demoted over her response to being targeted by a mess-hall prank.

Petra Lovetinska went from cadet major and battalion executive officer to senior private and received 20 demerits. She also was ordered to do 40 marching tours in the barracks. Each tour is 50 minutes, at a pace of 120 steps per minute, while carrying a rifle.

Lovetinska, who graduates May 13, was targeted by the prank called "wiping out the shoes." Citadel spokeswoman Heather Anderson said.

The prank — part of the 154-year-old military school's tradition — goes like this: An upperclassman tells a freshman cadet, called a knob, to crawl under the table and pour condiments such as ketchup or salad dressing on an upperclassman's shoes without getting caught.

Success wins the knob the admiration of classmates, commanding officers and other upperclassmen. Failure typically results in a pitcher of tea being poured on the knob.

What got Lovetinska in trouble is the way she reacted, Anderson said. She grabbed the knob, a male cadet, and wiped her shoes on his trousers.

UPC concert connects with audience of 200

Marvelous 3 played in front of a smaller crowd than expected Friday night at Memorial Stadium. The band, which was scheduled to begin its show at 9 following the Manhattan-based band PodStar, took the stage almost an hour early.

Although there were fewer than 200 people in the audience, Marvelous 3 told them to imagine a crowd of thousands.

The members of Marvelous 3 did the same. "Everyone was really cool," said Butch Walker, Marvelous 3 lead singer and guitarist. "They were a small but mighty crowd. They kicked ass and made a lot of noise."

The band made the audience a part of the show, which it is known for doing.

"The one thing we've always tried to do is connect with the audience," Walker said. "One thing that Marvelous 3 fans like is that they know when they come they are going to be part of the show."

The band, which was sponsored by Union Program Council, had not performed live in five months because it had been recording its new album, "Ready, Sex, Go," slated for release this summer. The Manhattan show was the first of a series of the band's weekend concerts in May before a national tour in June.

"We're rusty," Walker told the crowd. "Get over it. This is a 'having-fun' show. You guys are making this fun. We're going to keep playing for you until the cops tell us to go home."

The crowd responded to the band's live energy.

"It was wonderful and very energetic," said Malinda

Lead singer and guitarist Butch Walker signs autographs after his performance Friday night.

Lindsay Clingan, senior at Manhattan High School, sits on her friend's shoulders during a Marvelous 3 concert at Memorial Stadium. About 200 people attended the concert Friday night.

Schneider, graduate student in family studies. "It was a nice change for Manhattan. I'd heard them on the radio before, but now I'm a fan for life."

Marvelous 3 played songs off "Hey Album," which includes hits "Freak of the Week," and "Every Monday." The band included some not-yet-released songs, such as "My Little Head," from its new album. The band also played songs from its first album, as well as a few songs, such as "Bohemian Rhapsody," made famous by other artists.

Many of the band's fans said they enjoyed seeing Marvelous 3 play because of the band's visual show.

"They put on one of the best live shows," said Eric Mitchell, a fan who drove from Independence, Mo., to see Marvelous 3 play live for the fifth time. "I don't think you could go away not liking them."

Always communicating with the audience, the band had a few messages, which it shared with the crowd. The first was regarding the type of music for which it is known, which is 1980s-like rock.

"Someone out there has to carry the torch for rock 'n' roll, because it sure isn't NSync or Britney Spears," Walker said. "I've got three words for them: bye, bye, bye."

Marvelous 3's second message was for its fans.

"The message is, 'Live life to the fullest, because tomorrow you could be gone,'" Walker said. "'Don't let anyone hold you down. Be your own person, and get out there and have a great time.' Deep in our hearts, rock 'n' roll is supposed to be fun."

The band also told the audience that it deserved the "Too much rock for one hand award." The award was a two-handed gesture that the band displayed for the audience.

Walker said Marvelous 3 has been together for around three years and enjoys being on the road.

"I started the group a couple of years ago," he said. "It started out as something I was going to do as some sort of a tribute to the rock that I grew up on, and I ended up recruiting the bass player and the drummer, who were guys that I had been playing with in bands for the last 12 years. Hence, we called it Marvelous 3 as kind of a light-hearted stab at the fact that we had been together through everything and outlasted the lifespan of a cockroach."

After the show, which lasted an hour and a half, the members of Marvelous 3 talked to the audience for around 30 or 45 minutes.

The band answered questions, listened to comments, posed for pictures with the fans and signed autographs. When the stage crew was packing up the last of the stage props and instruments, the members of Marvelous 3 still were chatting with their fans.

"You're all part of the Marvy love and the Marvy family," Walker said. "If we know you guys had a good time, then we did our job."

Haymaker benefit supports local club, attracts 500 people

By TARYN FORT
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It seems the third time is the charm. The third-annual Haylapalooza drew a total of about 500 people to the lawn across from Haymaker Hall throughout the day Saturday. The benefit for the Manhattan Boys and Girls Club proved to be the most successful it ever has been, said John Evans, lead vocalist for the Egomaniacs.

"Halfway through today, more people were in attendance than we had the entire day last year," Evans said. "We felt like this was such a great opportunity for the band, and we try to expose our music to as many different crowds as possible."

The day of games and music attracted an all-ages audience ranging from K-State students to small children. Games such as Destruction and a mountain-climbing wall were a couple of the activities offered throughout the day. A new band played every hour from noon until 9 p.m.

"I came out to just chill out and listen to some music," Josh Stuchlik, freshman in feed science said. "It's kind of nice, because this is taking place right here across from my dorm, so there really is no reason to not just walk on over."

Most of the bands were local ones whose members said they felt it would be a change to play outside, from the usual venue of playing in bars.

"We almost always just play in bars, so the fact that this was outside was a new opportunity for us," said Thad Reist, member of The Fools and senior in music. "We like to play for an all-age show, and since this was tied to a good cause as well, we thought that it was well worth our time."

The event, organized by Haymaker Hall Governing Board members, has been a main topic of discussion for the entire semester at each HGB meeting. Ford Hall's governing board also helped out by running a couple of the booths.

"I thought that this would be an interesting way for me to contribute to the hall governing board," said Tammy Osborn, freshman in international studies and political science. "I worked a booth, and I also really wanted to hear some of the local bands that I hear so much about."

Children from the Boys and Girls Club participated in games throughout the day. Food and drinks were provided by Derby Food Center, and earnings from T-shirt sales were given to the Boys and Girls Club.

"I wish some more of the kids from the club would have been able to come, because everyone had a great time," said Zac Collins, president of Haymaker and freshman in anthropology. "It has been a really nice day for all of the activities."

KSU would change with board in charge

As the semester winds down, the Collegian editorial board has found many changes it would like to make on campus. Here are a few of the changes its members would institute if they were in charge.

- Issue a formal surrender to Fort Riley.
- Pay faculty more and coaches less.
- Ban Acacia.
- Bring back Coke.
- New women's sport — equestrian bowling.
- Adopt a resolution naming Crum's Beauty College as our new rival.

- Build a secret tunnel from Kedzie Hall to the K-State Student Union.
- Market Call Hall ice cream nationwide.
- Destruction of Denison Hall.
- Stop charging admission to men's basketball games.
- Legalize alcohol in the parking lot before football games — and inside during the games.
- Open campus tribunals.
- Cancel class when it's cold — below 65 degrees.
- New K-State president — Tom Asbury.
- Parking solution — heliport on Hale Library.

- Outdoor pool on Anderson lawn. Beach parties when the temperature tops 90.
- Human Ecology 564 — Bartending.
- Students get to meet with next Landon Lecturer, Dennis Miller.
- Sack lunches in the Union each Friday.
- Move basketball back to Ahearn Field House.
- Make homecoming more inclusive of non-greeks.
- No smoking on campus unless you're on fire.
- Bring back the bison.
- More campus television.
- Death penalty for Frisbee Golf.

- Death penalty for mentioning — or even thinking about — Tatonka.
- Advisers make you breakfast.
- Derby Days participants must actually wear a derby.
- Zero-tolerance policy on public displays of affection, resulting in a "♥F" being placed on offenders' transcripts.
- New school uniform — Capri pants.
- Finally, coffee in every classroom, with adequate cream and sugar to flavor.

Shouldn't that Tri-Delta ad be, "If you mess with the bull, you get the paddle"?

If No. 2 pencils are the most popular, then how come they're still No. 2?

If Title IX is all about equality, then when do we get a men's equestrian team?

Yeah, Sigma Chi, I was just wondering how much of my money for Derby Days actually goes to charity and how much actually goes to beer.

I can't tell what makes me sicker — smoking or David Levin.

The real reason David Levin doesn't smoke is because he might catch his hair on fire.

Someone needs to tell those sorority girls that bleach-blond hair and orange hair is out this season.

If you want to run naked in the streets, go to KU.

I think it's about time we, as a student body, congratulate the opinion writers for this semester on beating a dead horse.

Jenn Lake needs to get down off of her high horse and realize that the people who work at that certain Mexican restaurant don't talk about her anymore.

If Jenn Lake is so appalled at this certain Mexican restaurant, why does she still continually go in there and eat?

The last thing we need is more Fortmeyers writing for the Collegian.

To all the minors who might be upset at Lucky's closing: don't worry, the Aggie Lounge is still open.

The list of illegal pets in Thursday's paper concerns me. I'm a little worried the cops are going to try to yank my monkey out of my apartment.

I thought we signed a deal with Pepsi. Why is the Derby still serving Coke products? I want my damned Mountain Dew.

The tan sorority girls are looking like Oompa Loompas these days, because they're so orange.

I'd like to thank the Royal Purple for taking my picture three times and not printing it anywhere.

Would somebody please make Kelly Furnas quit writing, please? She makes me want to quit going to the movies altogether.

Hey, Travis Weigel. We're having a rush party Saturday, and you're invited.

How many more columns and editorials do we have to endure on the Acacia thing? Why don't you people get a real life?

Richard, have you ever heard of redshirt freshman Michael Vick?

Welcome to Police State, USA

3 amendments to U.S. Constitution violated by federal government's actions in Miami home

I always wondered how people allowed the Holocaust to happen. The Saturday morning of Easter weekend, I found out. Two things happened that morning that could spell the end of our democracy and the start of something as frightening as Nazi Germany.

One was the raid to retrieve Elian Gonzalez. The second was the public's response to a slap in the face of three of our constitutional rights.

People will say comparing seizing a 6-year-old at gunpoint to Nazi Germany is outrageous. It's far from the same thing, and it couldn't happen here.

People in Nazi Germany thought the same thing. It was a slow, subtle process to genocide filled with sidestepping the issues.

We're not headed to genocide, but we are headed to a police state and a dictatorship where anything is possible.

We're headed there because our constitutional rights are disappearing.

In Germany, people thought the issue was the poor economy and a lack of national pride. But to Adolf Hitler, the issue was hate.

The issue here isn't where Gonzalez ends up, although prior to the raid it might have been. It isn't about who gets custody of him.

It's about the government breaking the law and taking our constitutional rights.

The Fourth Amendment rights of the Gonzalez family in Miami were violated by the Clinton administration and the Department of Justice.

Contrary to popular belief or what you might hear from spin doctors on the news, the Gonzalez family did not break the law. Our government and the Justice Department did.

Attorney General Janet Reno, President Clinton and the Justice Department said they raided the Gonzalez home because the family was breaking the law. According to them, the Gonzalez family refused to return Elian to his father after the Justice Department ordered it.

News flash: In the United States, no one but the military is expected to blindly follow orders.

In America, if you are issued an order from some authority, you have a constitutional right to go through the courts and question that order. That's what the Miami family did.

In the case of Elian, Immigration and Naturalization Service gave custody of Elian to the Miami family.

The Miami family members were within their rights to refuse to return the boy when ordered, because they were, and technically still are, the boy's legal guardians.

The family took the order from Reno to the 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals to rule on that order.

The court did not rule for or against Reno's order. The court said instead that Elian could request asylum.

Reno was embarrassed the court did not side expressly with her and demand the boy be returned to his father.

The department's next action in the face of humiliation was a violation of the Sixth Amendment, which allows due process of law. The department is now saying it obtained a search warrant prior to the raid, while the Deputy Attorney General Eric Holder said it didn't have one and didn't need one Easter morning on "Meet the Press" with Tim Russert.

Ultimately, Reno should have gone through the courts to solve this problem and said from the beginning that she had. They should have appealed the 11th Appeals Court's decision to the Supreme Court or waited until the May 11 hearing before the federal appeals court on the asylum request.

Instead, the Justice Department and INS burst into an American family's home and seized a 6-year-old boy at gunpoint. They barged in with guns because they said they didn't know if the family had guns in the house.

Members of the Justice Department and dozens of lawyers and police had been in and out of the Gonzalez house.

They knew the people involved, and they should have had an idea of what was inside. Raiding a drug house when nothing is known about the people entirely is different.

Also, 40 percent of American households have guns. Although some believe it shouldn't be, bearing arms is a constitutional right.

You shouldn't have to fear the government busting into your home in SWAT gear when you haven't broken any laws, because you choose to exercise that right to have guns.

By the way, the government knew the Gonzalez family to be law-abiding citizens. They found no guns, and the Gonzalez family didn't have any guns registered to them.

So, here's how the the German people allowed the Holocaust to happen: when the government and Hitler started taking away their rights, they said and did nothing.

Maybe it was because what was happening didn't directly affect them, as the Elian case doesn't directly affect us. Maybe it was because the issues were clouded with so much spin that Germans believed what was happening benefited them.

Either way, the only way evil conquers is for good people to say and do nothing.

That's what we're doing now after watching the government make a mockery of our Constitution. Our constitutional rights are disappearing, but few have noticed.

The raid to retrieve a 6-year-old Cuban boy on Easter weekend should have been a wake-up call to all Americans.

Government should stop regulating basic rights in game against Gates

The United States and Bill Gates lately have been playing their own game of Monopoly.

The first move was Gates' creation of Microsoft, and now the government says he is moving around the playing board, buying up all the properties and preventing others from producing software.

The result of this would be that Gates can charge exorbitant rates and fees for the purchase and use of Microsoft products. So now, we are trying to divide Microsoft into separate technological arenas, like separating Microsoft Internet from Microsoft Office.

After searching the World Wide Web for information and opinions, I get the impression I am about to be alone in my sentiments, but I think this whole mess is ridiculous. The United States today increasingly is worried about regulation. We regulate just about every aspect of life. We even try to regulate our most basic rights. In this case, we are trying to regulate against a monopoly. This is not entirely bad, as there have been monopolies that needed to be broken up, such as the Bell telephone companies.

However, I see a difference. Bell telephone companies actually prevented the creation of other local phone-service providers. However, I don't believe Gates is attempting to monopolize the software market.

I think Gates has stumbled upon his monopoly without intentions of controlling the software market. He has made deals with Apple Macintosh that result in a certain amount of control over the company. However, since when do we call competitive, good business a monopoly?

Companies buy or buy into other companies every day. Are we so worried about Gates because he has so much money, or is it because the quick advancement of technology frightens us? I don't know, but I do know that Gates, through Microsoft, has given us something amazing.

We now have technological capabilities we hadn't had before. Gates advocates free speech on the Web, provides jobs for hundreds of people, aids the economy and gives tons of money to charities, and we are trying to make him less profitable and give Microsoft less power.

I argue Microsoft has so much power because Gates is the only person we have come across so far who had the intellectual and business capabilities to produce such a vast business. To me, he shows good, competitive business profits all.

A monopoly can be described as a company that strives to control a market through deliberately placed barriers. I don't think Gates has put up deliberate barriers. He is a good businessman.

Granted, Gates might profit more than others, but that's the way things are. Some of us make wagonloads of money, and some of us can't fill a jelly jar. But he did create the Microsoft company. We, as citizens, are profiting, too. The price of computers and software has decreased in recent years as technology has advanced.

In order to make sure this continues and prices don't go up, I admit it wouldn't hurt anyone to keep an eye on Microsoft.

I think, in due time, another software genius will come along and give Gates some competition.

Until then, we should just relax and enjoy what we have been given.

More than 40 people walked in the six-mile Walk for Educational Advancement on Saturday morning in Manhattan. The walk raised money for the Upward Bound Math and Science program.

walk for EDUCATION

Walk raises money for K-State Upward Bound program

After walking more than six miles, Kanita Taponpanh said she was glad to rest.

"It was really fun," she said. "It was tiring, though."

Taponpanh, a freshman at Salina South High School, and about 40 others joined together in the Walk for Educational Advancement Saturday. The event, along with a raffle, raised money for the Upward Bound Math and Science program, a federally funded program that provides students with economically or educationally disadvantaged backgrounds educational opportunities.

"It went really well," said NaTashua Davis, student services coordinator. "Everyone made it back in one piece."

She said the event raised around $2,000. Participants raised money for the walk-a-thon by getting pledges and selling raffle tickets.

The prizes raffled included a football signed by K-State head football coach Bill Snyder, former player Veryl Switzer and various other K-State players, gift certificates to local restaurants, a shelf-top stereo and other small prizes.

All proceeds went toward UBMS research, scholarship programs and educational field trips.

Nicole Florez, sophomore at Salina Central, said it is her first year in the UBMS program and that she enjoys it.

"It gives us a lot of opportunities to go see and do things," she said. "And you get to meet new people."

She said getting people to donate money for the walk wasn't difficult.

"A lot of teachers were surprised when I went and asked them for pledges," Florez said. "They all thought it was a really good program to be involved in — so they were all willing to help sponsor."

She said being in the program has been to her advantage, because when teachers find out she is in it, they are more willing to help.

"They find out and are kind of shocked," she said. "Then they are willing to help out more."

Taponpanh said one of the things about the program she was really excited about was staying in the K-State residence halls in the summer for six weeks to take classes.

"It's going to give us a taste of what college life is going to be like, and being away from home," she said.

The program, which has around 50 high school students from Topeka and Salina, gives its members the opportunity to live in the dorms for six weeks while taking classes that count for high school electives.

"It's precollege experience," Taponpanh said. "At least you have something to do in the summer instead of watching television all day."

Florez said the program will help them when they go off to college because they will already have an idea of what college is like.

"We get to find out more about college and what it's going to be like," she said. "They prepare us."

Davis said students enjoyed the walk because of their love for the program.

"Everyone enjoyed it because of the cause," she said.

"They kept that in mind, and that's why they liked it."

Java owners possibly to open grocery store for gourmet food in Aggieville

By BROOKE ERICKSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The owners of Java Espresso & Bakery might be taking on another commitment.

The vacant spot between Hair Shapers and Patricia's Undercover on Moro Street is going to be the homestead of the new Mercado Gourmet Grocery store, if Mark Skochdopole and his wife, Laura, have their say.

They said they hope the new store will be ready by mid-summer. Skochdopole said he thinks Manhattan needs a store like this.

"Manhattan needs a gourmet store because the closest place is Kansas City," he said.

The store is going to have different things than a typical grocery store.

"We're not going to have any meats, cheeses or any refrigerated foods," said Jennifer Franklin, manager of the new Mercado store. "We're going to have higher-end pastas, rice, pasta sauces, marinades and spices."

Franklin said there's going to be a multitude of different items.

"There's going to be different types of salts and peppers," Franklin said. "Three of the salts are sea salts, rock salts and Celtic salts. And another type of pepper is pepper corn."

Skochdopole said he is gearing the business toward the locals.

"We're gearing it more towards the locals, because many college students are on a limited budget, even though we have average prices."

Franklin said she thinks the Manhattan community is ready for a business like this.

"We're very knowledgeable about what they like out there," she said.

"We're bringing a little bit to them."

Franklin said Aggieville was a good area in which to have a business.

"It's very easy to get to."

Mark Crouser, graduate student in journalism, thinks this is a good idea.

"I think it could work," Crouser said. "It's nice because it gives the people of Manhattan a variety."

Erik Pollom, graduate student in regional and community planning, said a new new store would offer choices to all the different types of people living in Manhattan.

"There's such an eclectic mix of people at K-State," he said. "There's people coming from all over, and they all have different tastes."

Because Manhattan is a college town, Mercado might have cooking demonstrations in the store.

Customers will be taught how to make red sauce, which Franklin said is cheaper than buying a jar at the store.

"It takes 10 minutes, and it's a really good, healthy meal."

They also might learn how to make pasta and how to cook the noodles.

"Making pasta noodles is a lot of fun," Franklin said.

Keeping their sister store in mind, Skochdopole will be selling bread and whole-bean coffee from Java.

If a pound of coffee is bought, they also will grind it in the store for the customer to take home.

One last thing Mercado will be offering is gift baskets.

"People can mix and match anything in the store for the gift baskets," Skochdopole said. "They can do themes like coffees and teas, cookies and teas, chocolates — anything."

SPRINGING TO THE FOREFRONT

STORY BY NICK BRATKOVIC ■ PHOTOS BY KELLY GLASSCOCK

Ell Roberson, Beasley lead Cat practice teams in fans' 1st glance at KSU 2000 football squad

Saturday's spring game was filled with a lot of vanilla offense, as K-State quarterback Jonathan Beasley put it. It was also a game for new faces to be introduced, including Ell Roberson.

The game likely will be remembered not for the 30-28 score, but for the day Roberson left his first footprints on K-State's Astroturf.

Roberson, who started for the white squad, or the No. 2 offense, took the opening play 73 yards from scrimmage.

"I just kind of cut back and took it to the house," Roberson said. "Once I saw that it was one-on-one, I kind of coasted in."

Roberson was gone, and the crowd of 13,742 fans was there to witness it. The play had at least one more interested observer: Beasley.

"I told him why you gotta do that on the first play," Beasley said.

Beasley put up some strong statistics of his own by completing 11 of 24 passes and throwing for 160 yards. In the game's format, the second-team offense played against the second-team defense, and the first-team offense played against the first-team defense.

Roberson, on the other hand, played on both. It was an attempt by the K-State coaching staff to work Roberson in and get him experience with both units. K-State offensive coordinator Ron Hudson said repetition is critical at this stage of Roberson's career.

"From an athletic standpoint, he probably did," Hudson said. "From a mental standpoint he is not quite there right now. With young quarterbacks, you want to bring them along and get them to the point where they know the mistakes they are making."

"That's up to him, to play this position in this offense, throw, throw, throw. I think he will just get better and better."

The K-State offense also was working on throwing the football to different spots on the field and highlighting different elements of the offense.

Quincy Morgan goes for a pass over the defending Dyshod Carter in the second half of Saturday's spring game. Morgan had five catches for 42 yards for the purple team, which won 30-28.

K-State head coach Bill Snyder highlighted the process' importance when he was asked if the team had practiced it in the 15 spring practices.

"It is built into the system, it is built into the system," Snyder said. "That is, just if you want to line up and take the fullback away, it's not that hard to do."

"But if you don't, then that needs to be built in." The Cats also worked the fullback position in the contest. Johnny Lazetich ran the ball on five carries for 68 yards and took one run inside the five.

"I wanted to get him the ball so that he could come into the locker room and say, 'I am fine,'" Snyder said. "That is what he feels right now."

Lazetich said he enjoyed the coaches' responses. "The coaches always laugh about a fullback getting the ball," Lazetich said. "So after a long run, you kind of just get up and look over there."

In terms of rushing, David Allen ran the ball 19 times for 66 yards.

In the scrimmage, the Cats were able to get the ball to a variety of players, and it was a situation of taking advantage of match ups.

The team's toughness was somewhat tested in the game. After the game, Snyder said his players need to develop a certain degree of toughness, and that he was pleased with K-State linebacker Warren Lott's effort.

"That is what you have to have. We are getting ready to make a drive, and there're three players that are standing next to me. That doesn't make you very happy, and our players understand that," Snyder said.

"We are never going to play somebody that is injured. You know it's the old adage, knowing the difference between injured and pain. And if you hurt or you are dinged up a little bit you have got to be able to play."

Individual competition was the focus as much as the final score. Now players will spend the remaining months before the season working out and

Speculation likely over who should quarterback team

VIEWPOINT

NICK BRATKOVIC

After Saturday's spring football game, only one question remains: who is the quarterback going to be? It is a question that will weigh on the minds of the purple faithful all summer, and it should play out in the hot sun.

I can see the message boards now pleading, pulling every statistic out of the air, making a case for their guy. The Campus Fourum will begin to pipe up on the topic, and talk shows will blare with discussions.

Sports media members will talk about the situation.

The two camps will be divided along the lines of those who support the incumbent and the ones who like the new blood.

Jonathan Beasley's supporters will make comparisons between Beasley and Michael Bishop and mention their junior years. They will point to shoulder injuries and applaud his Culligan Holiday Bowl performance.

Others will point to Ell Roberson's high school statistics and his glorious numbers against K-State's second-team defense. All the hype will build, and the ultimate answer will rest with one man.

No, not Regis Philbin, but K-State head coach Bill Snyder. Snyder likely will be able to laugh as the arguments are made and ultimately will do what he feels is best for the team.

So who do you start at quarterback if you are Snyder? It is a question of the type that only can be determined by head coaches and men who speak in cautious, guarded tones about things such as the dive play.

It is weird, because this topic is so sensitive that the term gap has almost become a cliché. So, how wide is the gap? Is the gap closed? Has the gap been widened? All of those questions are started with either Roberson or Beasley's name.

Does anyone else remember when the word "gap" stood for a store where you could purchase a nice pair of khaki's? The gap is now the buzzword around Manhattan as it is being applied to this situation.

On the one hand, playing quarterback you have Beasley, a cagey veteran who knows the offense and has the phone book, I mean playbook, memorized. He says the right things and fancies himself a leader. He is not as explosive as Roberson but will not hurt you. He is, in a lot of ways, like that old car that never breaks down but still doesn't really excite you. Kind of like an old episode of "Full House."

Then there is Ell Roberson, who is flashy, quick and can turn on a dime. He is the new model car but hasn't quite mastered all of the intricate gadgets (a.k.a. the K-State offense). He doesn't fully know how the system works but likes to run it at 100 mph. The awesome thing about the new car is that you will have a lifetime together, whereas the old reliable car will likely break down soon. In TV terms, Roberson would be like "The Sopranos".

But the question is, do you take the new model and tolerate the inexperience, or do you go with the older, safer model that can run things smoothly?

I don't know. Maybe it's because all of my cars always have been hunks of junk, but I want the newer model.

My money is on Roberson. Why not roll the dice and give the guy an opportunity? He might be the second coming of Michael Bishop, and from the looks of a 73-yard opening play in the spring game, he could be special. If inexperience is a knock, then why was Virginia Tech quarterback Michael Vick such a stud? I bet right now that coaching staff really regrets making that decision.

In all honesty, I don't think Beasley is a bad quarterback, but he never really has created the excitement Roberson already has.

Really, if Roberson progresses like experts think he can, we could all be riding the "Ell Train" to the national championship.

This team needs Roberson to truly contend for a national title, and to beat Nebraska. I don't see Beasley improving that much and really lifting the K-State offense to new levels. The offense just will not be explosive enough. Although in just his second year, if there is one thing Roberson is, it is explosive.

Roberson can create and will take advantage of a weak non-conference schedule to get better and better. That is why you play those teams, to groom young players for future battles.

What better way to do it? Plus, it will add some genuine excitement to otherwise dismal early season games.

Well, that is my thought, but we all know that only one person's opinion really matters, and it isn't Philbin's.

Nonetheless, it should be an interesting summer.

Baseball team ends road losing streak by defeating MU

By SAM STIERS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State baseball team snapped its 19-game road losing streak Sunday by defeating the Missouri Tigers 9-6.

Despite the win, K-State (17-25, 4-18) lost the three-game series played in Columbia. The Cats dropped the first two games, losing 6-2 on Friday and 8-6 on Saturday.

The Cats scored early and often in the final game of the series, scoring two runs in the first inning. The Cats would relinquish the lead in the bottom half of the inning, but K-State first baseman Mark English came through in the second inning.

English hit a three-run home run in the top of the second to give the Cats a 7-4 lead. Missouri (29-18, 10-11) cut the lead to one in the fourth inning, but could not deny K-State its first win in seven games.

Senior pitcher Jason Wells started the game for K-State and earned his fourth win of the season. Derek Ver Helst blanked the Tigers through 3 2/3 innings and picked up his second save of the season.

The second game of the series was a heartbreaker for the Cats.

K-State jumped on Missouri early. The Cats scored two runs in the first and second innings and had a 4-0 lead heading into the bottom of the fourth. Missouri battled back, and the score was tied at six as the Tigers came to bat in the decisive eighth inning.

Missouri third baseman Landon Brandes hit a two-out, two-RBI single in the eighth to put Missouri up for good. The Tigers would end up winning the game 8-6.

K-State freshman reliever Todd Lundwall allowed the tying run in the bottom of the sixth inning and fell to 1-3 on the year.

Missouri pitching dominated the first game of the series. Tiger pitchers Jon Harris and Mitch Kiler combined to throw a three-hitter. The Cats did have opportunities — Harris walked seven batters through 6 1/3 innings.

However, the Cats continued to struggle with runners on base, and the only two K-State runs scored on Pat Maloney's two-run homer in the second inning.

Junior pitcher Scott Tallman took the loss for K-State, falling to 0-2 for the season. Tallman allowed five runs in six innings.

K-State's next game is Tuesday at home against Wichita State at 7 p.m.

SPRING GAME

taking the short lessons learned in spring ball and applying them to their overall game, Hudson said. He said these times are critical for any player, but especially a redshirt freshman like Roberson.

He also said Beasley continues to impress him.

"Jonathan Beasley is continuing to get better. He is doing a lot of the things. He understands things and understands the offense and things that we are trying to get done," Hudson said. "We are talking about a kid who checks off to the right plays against Washington in the bowl game, and he's no slouch, and was the most valuable player in that game."

"This kid is no slouch. Maybe he is not the burner that Eli Roberson is, but he makes the good throws and understands where to throw it," Hudson said. "He has got to be able to totally understand the offense and do the things that you continually are trying to get him to do."

Snyder said after the game that a great deal of his evaluation of the game will come from what the two quarterbacks were able to do against the first-team defense. Roberson praised the defense and said that while his numbers did drop, he was pleased with the effort.

"I think I did pretty good. Our defense is real good, so if I could throw the ball a little bit, that's good," Roberson said.

Beasley said he and Roberson give K-State a different look offensively.

"He's a little faster, you all can tell that," Beasley said. "That's his style — he runs around and makes the big plays, where I just try to take what they give us."

Captains named before game

Prior to Saturday's game, K-State head coach Bill Snyder named his captains for the 2000 football season: senior quarterback Jonathan Beasley and senior safety Jarrod Cooper were selected for the second-straight season, along with junior wide receiver Aaron Lockett and junior linebacker Ben Leber and senior center Randall Cummins.

A tough day

K-State running back Josh Scobey, a highly touted transfer, had a difficult day on Saturday. He ran the ball 10 times for 25 yards. It brought back similarities to former K-State running back Frank Murphy, who in his first season with the Cats had a difficult spring game.

"Josh struggled a little bit. I thought he ran hard, and I liked that," Snyder said. "Josh was excited, and I think it hindered his game a little bit. He was excited about being there, and it was his first time of playing in front of a bunch of people."

Colbert Hills founders celebrate opening

By LYNNE HERMANSEN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The founders of the Colbert Hills Golf Course celebrated its opening a private event Sunday.

One hundred and forty golfers from across the country came to test the new golf course that officially opens to the public on May 7.

In addition, there was a group of at least 60 founders who had donated at least $100,000 toward the construction and opening of the course, Lindsay Hammerschmidt, pro shop employee, said.

The Inaugural Founders Tournament was scheduled to begin at 10:30 a.m. Sunday, but a rain delay postponed the opening of the tournament. Golfers eventually were able to play into the late afternoon after the rain had passed.

The course has been a work in progress for the past three years.

"It is the right time for the opening of the course," said Dave Gourlay, director of Colbert Hills. "There are too many people with an interest for it, and there is a huge marketplace for the golf course in this area."

From 11 a.m. to 5 p.m. today, the course is sponsoring an Inaugural Founders Pro-Am Golf Tournament for founders, partners, celebrities and pros. Opening ceremonies begin at 9 a.m. with a dedication.

After the tournament, a dinner and awards ceremony will take place. Those close to the course said it has been well received.

"So far the golf course has been well-received," Matt Gibson, assistant golf professional, said. "It will bring in golfers from all over the Midwest and the country, because of its challenge and beauty."

Six years ago, Senior PGA tour player Jim Colbert had the vision for a world-class golf course. The golf course is now located on the northwest edge of Manhattan, off Kimball Avenue. The course is 7,525 yards among 300 acres of Kansas prairie.

It has been rated one of the most challenging championship courses in the United States. It also was named one of the best courses in the Midwest.

"I have only received positive reactions about the course," Gibson said. "I have been here a month. I haven't played the course yet, but I'm looking forward to it."

The golf course, which is situated on rolling hills, has a spectacular view, Gibson said.

"You can not believe the views," Gibson said. "You can see some holes for miles. It is breathtaking, and some of the best views in Kansas. It is a beautiful course."

The golf course is open to anyone who wants to play. It will benefit the K-State men's and women's golf teams. K-State will be able to have golf tournaments on a national level, and K-State is among the few universities that will have the advantage of a home championship course.

K-State has the first PGA Tour Licensed Preferred Collegiate course.

"I think that it's worth coming out here," Gibson said. "It is an experience that any golfer would want to partake in."

School safety, gun-control issues spark debate

By ANJETTA McQUEEN
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Senate Democrats, angry that gun trigger locks and other safety measures remain stalled in juvenile justice legislation, now have a new vehicle big and popular enough to push their cause for weeks: education.

As debate begins Monday, federal school aid programs might get caught in the cross hairs.

"You can't separate safety and security in schools from the issue of the availability and the accessibility of guns," Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., said in an interview. "The public understands that school violence prevention is a complex issue. The American people are increasingly demanding that we take action."

On Friday, the two sides set up rooms in the Capitol Building to highlight their differences on who should control $20 billion in federal K-12 grants.

The Democrats replicated a classroom with student desks and chairs to hold interviews and Internet chats that coincide with President Clinton's Midwestern schools tour, promoting class-size reduction and after-school funding. Republicans planned online chats and events to tout the flexibility they say they're giving parents and schools with voucher proposals and block grants.

"There is a clear difference between us on who should set the priorities; people are going to want to know both sides," said Joseph Karpinski, a spokesman for Sen. James Jeffords, R-Vt., chairman of the Senate Health Education Labor and Pensions Committee. Jeffords is bringing the main proposal to his colleagues and must oversee the debate. Kennedy is the leading Democrat on the panel.

"We would hope it could stay a pure debate on education," Karpinski said.

Kennedy said he and others will be united in making gun-control proposals, adding that guns used in the Columbine slayings were acquired by the teen gunmen through loopholes in laws governing gun shows.

"When you talk about security and safety in schools, most of us have historically looked at smaller class sizes, after-school programs, and better trained teachers, but part of this whole thing is having schools free from easy accessibility to guns," Kennedy said.

House lawmakers will soon consider a school safety bill without trigger-lock requirements.

Democrats have long tried to attach gun control to other bills, but they weren't successful until the 1999 renewal of federal grants to states for juvenile delinquency programs.

However, the House and Senate plans failed to match: a Senate-passed bill set a 72-hour background check on gun-show sales and a House bill shrank the wait to 24 hours.

A House-Senate conference committee has been assigned to reconcile differences; normally when there are such differences on complex legislation, members and their advisers meet privately to work out a compromise. But politics intensified disagreements. Democrats unhappy with the pace of negotiations have demanded that House and Senate negotiators meet openly — hoping the public glare will prod them into action.

Meanwhile, Democrats and Republicans have a wide enough gulf to bridge in rewriting the Elementary and Secondary Education Act, which helps schools pay for programs ranging from boosting poor children's grades and test scores to training their teachers. It's the first time a Republican-led Congress has had a crack at the 34-year-old law — often criticized for failing its mission to properly educate the nation's poorest children. Individual plans to change the bill range from ensuring girls take as many math classes as boys, to restocking library shelves with books published after the 1960s.

Given the recent shootings at The National Zoo here, gun debate is likely to intensify.

Senate Democrat leader Tom Daschle, D-S.D., told reporters Thursday, "We have no choice but to revisit the question on other bills. Especially given the relationship between guns and schools these days, I think it's a natural assumption that one could make that there could be some amendments which will be offered."

Focus on guns, observers say, will shortchange education — and any hope for either party to craft a voter-friendly message on the popular election issue.

"It's certainly a mistake," said Darcy Olsen, who analyzes education policy for the Cato Institute, a Libertarian think tank. "It raises eyebrows anytime you try to pass legislation on one topic under the guise of another. That compromises both gun policy and education policy."

coming back with HEAT

New Toni Braxton album reveals personal victories

By SARAH McCAFFREY
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

Toni Braxton's latest release, "The Heat," showcases a new Braxton who has overcome her personal and professional struggles and come back even stronger.

The tracks on the compact disc provide a view into a soul that has been through the worst in relationships and survived to tell about them.

In the CD's liner notes, Braxton explains what she has been through in the past several years.

"Over the past three years, I've been broke, dumped and pimped," Braxton wrote. "I've often felt like I was walking around with 'the scarlet letter' stitched to my chest, from the way people treated me."

Songs such as "He Wasn't Man Enough," "I'm Still Breathing," and "You've Been Wrong" clearly come from a tormented heart.

Braxton laments how she has been treated poorly, yet counters with the message that anyone can survive a heartache and move on.

Other tracks, such as "Gimme Some" and "Maybe," are reminiscent of the old Braxton style. These songs aim to seduce the listener not only through Braxton's powerful vocals but also through solid lyrics. The songs are about sex and seduction, a subject no one ever expected to hear from a preacher's daughter.

The title track from the album is another one of Braxton's sexual anthems. The song is about the summertime romances that make the upcoming season the best of the year. With summer right around the corner, be looking for this song to pop up on the charts.

Some of the other songs on the album take the listener on a trip to the past. On "Fairy Tale" and "Speaking in Tongues," Braxton sings about how great her relationships were. She voices the thoughts and regrets everyone harbors about lost love in several beautifully written and produced tracks. Braxton is able to mold over-used subject matter into new and catchy creations.

Guest vocals from artists including Dr. Dre and Left Eye from TLC help to make this comeback album a success.

Dr. Dre is featured on "Just Be a Man About It." This song is written for any woman who ever has been in a relationship and gone through a sloppy breakup. Braxton pleads with Dr.

Dre to just tell her the truth so she can get on with her life.

"Gimme Some" is given a little extra punch when Left Eye lends a helping hand. The song has a solid dance beat that works when meshed with Braxton and Left Eye's vocal prowess.

Braxton's comeback album is a definite hit. She provides an excellent contrast to the teen queens who recently have dominated the airwaves. The album surely will appeal to listeners searching for a more polished sound that only time and experience could produce.

"The Heat"

Viewers able to suspend disbelief, follow plotline

By KELLY FURNAS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

The science fiction surrounding "Frequency" is so incredibly far-fetched, most people familiar with the theme going into the movie won't think its makers can pull it off.

For a great deal of the movie, they don't.

However, after a while, you start suspending disbelief. The plot grows on you, and before long, you are wrapped in the story completely.

James Caviezel plays a 1990s police officer who, because of aurora borealis, is able to communicate via radio with his father (Dennis Quaid) in the 1960s. The two use the communication to avert a family disaster, only to find their meddling caused even more problems.

The problem with the movie is not the dialogue — in fact, the scene when the two realize they're talking to each other is relatively believable. It's just that, after awhile, the complex history changes become overwhelming for the viewer.

Instead of remembering one story line, the viewer has to remember multiple ones. For those viewers who thrive on being able to understand exactly what is happening in a film, "Frequency" can be frustrating at times.

About halfway into the film, however, viewers change how they watch the film. They let loose of the need to comprehend the science aspect of the movie and focus more on the compelling adventure story.

The plot isn't the only thing that grows on the viewer. Set in Queens, N.Y., the film demands heavy New York accents from actors that take the audience a long time to get used to. Like every other bother-some element of the film, however, the viewer begins not even to notice the accent.

Aside from the accents, the actors do a commendable job in this film. Although Quaid seems to have a hard time playing a macho fireman, Caviezel actually is quite believable as a man who is battling the insanity of the multiple histories he remembers.

Overall, "Frequency" does a lot with the plot devices it uses. If viewers are able not to worry about believability from the onset, they probably will enjoy it even more.

VIEWPOINT

KELLY FURNAS

If I hear anything about my reviews, it's "I can't believe you gave a thumb's up/thumb's down to (fill in the blank)."

Of course, I welcome those comments. I said from the onset of writing reviews that they were simply my opinions, and that I hoped others would share their opinions as well. But some people I work with gawked because they thought a thumb's up meant the movie was terrific and the thumb's down meant the movie was terrible. On the contrary, most of the movies I saw were either tolerable or a little weak. Nevertheless, I still gave them thumb's up or thumb's down.

I could have made it easier on me (and harder on the reader) by giving ratings. If each of my movies would have received 2 1/2 stars, no one would have disagreed with me.

But for my reviews, I wasn't wanting to rank movies, only give a recommendation.

I was hoping to steer people away from bad movies and bring their attention to good movies they otherwise might not have seen. Did it work? Hard to say. In any case, it was a lot of fun.

Here's a summary of the movies I saw this semester:

Five worst movies:

5. "Hanging Up" — A silly flick about a woman having a family crisis. Poor direction, poor acting and a horrible script.

4. "Supernova" — A science-fiction flop that wastes Angela Bassett's talent. Another example of a movie whose producers think special effects alone can make a good film.

3. "Here on Earth" — The worst in a series of high school dramas. This movie cared so little about a plausible storyline and obviously was aimed solely at teenaged girls.

2. "The Beach" — I believe when I reviewed this film, I said it starred the shirtless chest of Leonardo DiCaprio. That's not fair. It starred a lot of other shirtless chests, too.

1. "Black and White" — Whenever a movie's best performance comes from Mike Tyson, well, it deserves to be on the bottom of somebody's list.

Five best movies:

5. "Cradle Will Rock" — This movie was so much of a surprise to me and a terrific example of Tim Robbins' genius. Seldom does a period piece have so much to say about humanity.

4. "The Talented Mr. Ripley" — Among the most disturbing films ever made. Ingeniously blends the genres of drama and thriller to keep viewers on the edge of their seats. This movie probably boasted the strongest ensemble of actors, as well.

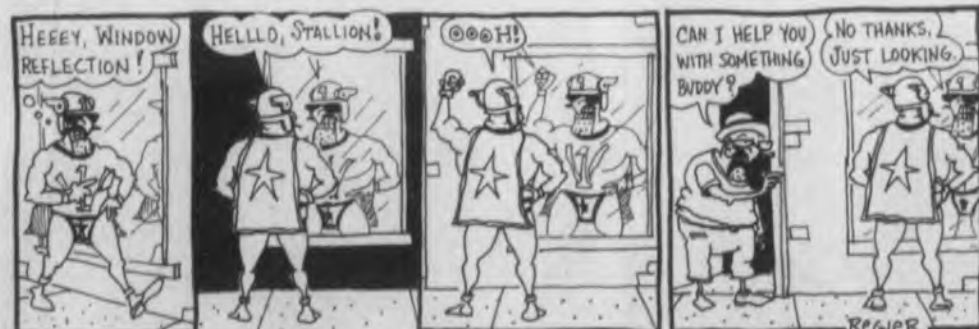

3. "Erin Brockovich" — If for no other reason, this movie deserves praise for being about a court case, but not showing a courtroom scene. This movie is Julia Roberts' best work to date, and I hope Albert Finney is remembered next year during Oscar-nomination time.

2. "The Cider House Rules" — Tremendous piece of movie-making. Although this movie revolved around Tobey Maguire and Charlize Theron, what made this film so intriguing was the backdrop of smaller, but brilliantly performed roles including Oscar-winner Michael Caine, and Delroy Lindo.

1. "The Hurricane" — This movie was snubbed both at the box office and at the Oscars, but it truly was one of the most remarkable films I've ever seen. Denzel Washington is indescribably perfect, and the film adds all of the extras — sharp dialogue, moving score and moody cinematography. Of all the movies I've ever seen, only "The Shawshank Redemption" ranks higher on my list.

Erne Love has 13 children and 15 horses on his farm. The children aren't his; neither are the horses. Love, a 65-year-old Manhattan resident, allows the K-State Rodeo Team to keep its horses and practice on his farm.

"I try to let them have the run of the house and the barn and make themselves at home," he said. "I'll go to bed, and I'll have a house full of kids, and they just make themselves at home."

"That's what we want them to do." Love, who rodeoed for 40 years, only charges the team for grain for its horses. Everything else is free, but the team helps him out a little.

"They all just jump in, and they help me do chores," he said.

Love started opening up his home to the rodeo team two years ago when friends of his called and asked if there were a place in Manhattan for their children to keep their horses while going to K-State. Love said he decided he would let them keep their horses at his home, and it just grew from there.

Stacia Wood is one of the members of the rodeo team who keeps her horse at Love's farm. She said Love has been a friend of her family's since before she was born.

"It feels a lot more like home," Wood, freshman in elementary education, said. "It's more relaxing. I know if I have problems, he's there to help."

Wood said Love enjoys having everyone there. "He's one of those guys who will do anything for us," she said. "You don't even have to ask him for things."

Wood said Love has been a good coach for many of the team members.

"He knows what he's doing," she said.

Love said he uses his rodeo experiences to help the early wanting him to rope. "I'm tired and don't want to, and then they leave and come back with my horse saddled for me," he said.

Love said that if the team stopped coming to his farm, he would miss it immensely.

"They get to be part of the family, I guess you would say," he said. "I just feel like it's probably the greatest way to retire that I could ever have."

"They're as good for me as I am for them."

students improve.

"I guess you could say I'm kind of a coach," he said. "I don't really mean to be, because they've got a fellow that's pretty good (coach Steve Frazier)."

Love said he generally makes beginning ropers rope a bale of hay 100 times before they actually get on a horse.

"One girl got clear up to 93, and then she missed it," he said. "But, now she's roping on a horse — doing real well, too."

Frazier said he doesn't go out to Love's farm, but said he's appreciative of what Love does to help out the students.

"I know Ernie's going to take care of the kids' horses and help them, too, and give them another opportunity to practice their skills," he said. "He helps them in horsemanship and things like that."

Frazier said there are other places in the Manhattan area for the students to keep their horses and practice, but it wouldn't have the same family atmosphere that Love's farm has.

Love is not only a second coach to some of the rodeo team members, but also something like another parent.

"I always try and get them to do schoolwork," he said. "That comes first, and then they rope."

Love said the students also keep him involved with them. He said on some mornings they'll get him up

Local silent auction, raffle raise $3,400 for memorial scholarship

By BEN HOPPER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A rural community gathered Saturday to honor a lost friend.

A benefit for the Silver Lining Memorial Scholarship took place at Riley County High School to remember April Larson, a cancer victim and 1998 graduate of RCHS.

The event raised $3,400 for the memorial scholarship. Larson died from cancer in 1999. Event coordinator Krista Thomas said she was overwhelmed after the fund-raiser.

"The day's events went really well. We had a good turnout from the beginning to end," Thomas said.

A silent auction took place throughout the day, allowing those in attendance to bid on various donated items. A K-State football helmet signed by head football coach Bill Snyder went for $310, Thomas said.

Other items included a quilt made of donated Riley County Falcons shirts and sweatshirts, a football signed by K-State football players, Country Stampede tickets, an autographed Kevin Lockett picture and car speakers.

"The bids from the silent auction far exceeded what I thought they would bring," she said.

Classmate Tana Henton performed with the Butler County Community College Headliners, the college's singing group.

Henton, who will attend K-State this fall in golf course management, said she was excited to do something for a friend.

"Anyone can get up and sing, but you have to have a purpose to perform," she said. "Today, my performance was for her. It was a chance for me to express my love for music and April's inspiration to everyone."

Teen-agers to people in their middle 40s competed throughout the day in a 3-on-3 basketball tournament, Thomas said.

Marci Shepherd, sophomore in business administration, coordinated the basketball tournament.

"We had about 50 to 60 players on 16 teams," she said.

Shepherd said Larson taught her that nothing is too hard to overcome.

"She was so brave and had such perseverance — she worked so hard," she said.

Larson attended K-State for about two semesters, but was unable to continue after chemotherapy treatments.

Shepherd, finance chairman, said they would establish the scholarship as a foundation, which has raised a total of about $5,000.

"We will give a $250 scholarship to an RCHS senior each year," she said.

Letters also were written to local businesses asking for tax deductible donations, Shepherd said.

A raffle, taco supper and potato bar, which served about 100 people, concluded the activities, Thomas said.

Debbie Larson, April's mother, said she was amazed at the event.

"When they announced the totals of the silent auctions, it brought tears to my eyes," she said.

Larson's class at RCHS decided to honor the memory of their classmate by starting the scholarship foundation.

The class named it after the award they gave to her at their graduation, the Silver Lining Award. Thomas said Larson was the silver lining behind all of their dark clouds.

"When they started this, they didn't think it would be as much work as it was, but they kept on going," she said.

Larson said the class always rallied around her daughter.

"They are a special, special group," she said.

The Larsons will attend a memorial for patients that have died from cancer Saturday at the KU Medical Center.

"It will be kind of a closure, talking to the doctors and nurses," she said. "The nurses were absolutely wonderful."

Jill Ballou, a registered nurse at the center, was one of Larson's nurses. She said Larson was one of her favorite patients.

"April was always cooperative and did what we needed her to do," she said. "She was always easy going and cheerful. I tried to be her nurse and her friend."

Larson had many friends and had an effect on the school, Kathy Lewis, a teacher at RCHS, said.

Lewis teaches English and had Larson her freshman and junior years.

"She made you think of your aches and pains," she said. "Students would look at her and ask, 'What am I whining about?'"

She said Larson was sometimes too weak to walk to her classroom, and that she would have Lewis come to the office to get help on an assignment.

"It made the other students think," she said.

Larson had a wonderful support system, Lewis said.

"It doesn't quit," she said. "She still has an impact."

MICHAEL YOUNG/COLLEGIAN

Marci Shepherd, a member of Riley County High School's 1998 class, enjoys a performance put on by the Butler County Community College Headliners on Saturday afternoon at Riley County High School. The event was part of a fund-raiser for the Silver Lining Memorial Scholarship. The scholarship was set up in honor of classmate April Larson, who recently died from cancer.

Hundreds of thousands march on National Mall in support of equal rights for gays

By GENARO ARMAS
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Hundreds of thousands of gays and supporters marched Sunday on the Capitol, transforming the National Mall into a sea of multicolored flags and joining hands in a show of unity they hope will transform recent victories into wider protections for homosexuals.

"We're only asking for the same rights as anyone else," Adam May of Atlanta declared as he walked with the throngs of marchers. "Depriving one person ... puts everyone at risk of losing."

In a crowd dotted with openly gay celebrities, the marchers celebrated a week of victories that included passage of a new law in Vermont giving gays marriage-like rights and a renewed plea by President Clinton for a federal Hate Crimes Prevention Act.

Participants vowed not to rest until same-sex couples get equal rights in all 50 states, and some wore costumes or carried signs calling attention to fights still on the horizon.

One man wearing a Boy Scout uniform held up a "Straight Scouts for gay scouts" sign, calling attention to a case heard by the Supreme Court last week, in which a Scout leader was fired because he was gay. Others carried signs saying "Stop Hate Crimes" and chanted "full rights for gays."

Clinton spoke to the first gay rights march on Washington since 1993 via videotape. His image broadcast on a giant screen, the president declared he had presided over "the most inclusive administration in history" that has appointed more than 150 openly gay people to important government posts.

Small Business Administration head Aida Alvarez praised Clinton and Vice President Al Gore as true believers in making government represent all groups.

Law-enforcement officials said there was no sign of any anti-gay rights demonstrators, and agreed with estimates that the crowd numbered at least 200,000 in size. March co-chair Donna Red Wing gave a much higher estimate, saying it might have been as large as a million.

March organizers spoke of trying to mobilize gay and lesbian supporters into an important voting bloc for November's presidential election, and some dismissed Republican George W. Bush's recent overture to the gay community.

"I think there would be a lot of anger if Bush got elected, because a lot of conservative values would come back into play," said Debbie Fitzpatrick, who traveled from New Jersey for the march. "The Clinton administration has done more for gays than anyone in the past."

One demonstrator sported a "Gore 2000" button and wore a T-shirt urging Bush's defeat.

Not all pro-gay activists were happy about the march.

William K. Dobbs of New York, a member of the Ad Hoc Committee for an Open Process, said many felt left out of the march planning because local grassroots organizing committees weren't used as in past years. His group urged a boycott of the event.

"This march has opened up a rift over who speaks for the movement and how decisions are made," Dobbs said. "The way it's been done is to use a lot of Hollywood celebrities and newspaper advertising, no local organizing committees. There's no platform, ... and much of the decisions were made behind closed doors."

Julian Potter, the White House liaison to the gay and lesbian community, tried to smooth over differences.

"We don't always agree" on which path to take, but "what I do know is that every step we take" leads closer to equal rights for all, Potter said.

"Siblings are used to their big brother or sister being away," Maples said. "They are accustomed to being the only one at home. Jealousy might happen, and time conflicts might happen with cars, bathrooms and TV."

Maples said that to cope with this, students must deal with siblings as they would with their parents.

"Again, I go back to open communication," Maples said. "Be open and willing to share your experiences. They just want to know what it was like."

said she came to see the belly dancers perform but learned a lot about other cultures as well.

"I really liked seeing the pictures of China," Peterson said. "I had no idea it was so green. It wasn't the picture of China I had in my head at all."

Dave Wood, sophomore in music, set up a table displaying different parts of Irish culture. He said he wants people to know that the Irish culture has more to offer than a rich drinking history. Wood said demonstrations such as Friday's offer an opportunity to educate those who are interested in moving past the basic introduction to Irish culture.

"It is a very diverse history," Wood said. "Lots of people don't know that people in Ireland have their own language, Gaelic, that 90 percent of the population speak."

Jessica Kopecky, senior in psy-

Along with spending time with family, Maples also suggested staying busy.

"Boredom can set in fast," he said. "Students need to stay busy during the summer whether it be a part-time job, a class at the local community college or a little bit of both. You can still enjoy your summer."

While enjoying the summer break, Maples suggested keeping in contact with college friends.

"You have a life elsewhere now," Maples said. "You have friends, people that you've come to rely on. They're your social system, so it's important to keep those ties."

chology, decided to represent Mexican culture through food. Serving up a non-alcoholic version of sangria, she said learning about different cultures is fun.

Kopecky decided to represent Mexico because she has taken Spanish classes and enjoys the culture. She said food is a good introduction into a culture.

"It is fun to learn about different countries, and food is one way to experience different cultures," she said.

After all was said and done at the end of the evening, Gaffin said she was pleased with the turnout and participation.

"One Putnam resident told me that he planned on coming for only a few minutes but wound up staying for the whole two hours," she said. "So many people came and learned something but had fun at the same time. I could not have hoped, wished or planned for anything more than that."

Day," was the theme for weekend ceremonies across the country.

Vietnam also freed more than 12,000 prisoners nationwide Sunday in the country's biggest-ever amnesty.

"This day is very important day for our country," said Lam Tuyen, a convicted murderer released from a reformation camp north of Ho Chi

"It will throw you from side to side," he said. "There are lots of rocks to hit on the car."

After driving his four laps, Turner said he hoped the team would be able to manage a top-25 finish. Overall, though, it came up short of this mark, finishing the competition in 32nd place.

"I've had a lot of fun, but it's frustrating when your car breaks," Turner said. "We're coming back next year."

Brigham Young University's team coasted through the challenges with a total score of 874.151, placing it in first. In addition, Brigham Young's second team followed close behind in third place.

Michael Dieter, who made the trip from Roseau, Minn., looked on as his son's team participated in its second year of the mini baja competition. His son, a senior in mechanical engineering, drove for the LeTourneau University's team.

The team finished with a cumulative score of 847.348 and was ranked seventh overall.

"They felt they engineered their car well this year," Dieter said. "The weather couldn't be better."

Minh City after spending 15 years in prison. "In personal terms, I feel like I am being born for a second time."

Ho Chi Minh City's wide boulevards were bathed in a rainbow of the bright colors of spring — red, blue, yellow and purple. Trees, utility poles and street corners were dressed with the flags of Vietnam and the Communist Party and with placards marked in large numbers "30.4," April 30, the day Saigon died.

Tanks 390 and 843 crashed through the gates of what was then known as Independence Palace, and the communists hoisted their flag at 11:30 a.m. on that fateful day 25 years ago.

Vietnam was reunified, and the building was renamed Reunification Palace. It is now a museum. Ho Chi Minh died in 1969.

Across the street from the palace were some of the forgotten victims of the war — the South Vietnamese who fought alongside the Americans, now cast aside to the streets and ignored, languishing in poverty.

Nguyen Van Hien stood alongside his cyclo-pedicab awaiting passengers in what he hoped would be a profitable day — $10 in earnings.

"I don't care about the anniversary," Hien said. "My priority is to earn a living to support my four children."

A neurologist who had befriended Baumhammers in an Internet chat group about the eastern European country of Latvia, where Baumhammers' parents were born, and had traveled with him, said Baumhammers often expressed paranoid ideas and sometimes believed he was being followed.

"Some of the things he said were just so outlandish," Dr. George Naruns said Sunday from his home in St. Petersburg, Fla.

He said Baumhammers would come across as normal in one conversation and express strange ideas in the next. Naruns said he also appeared to have personality problems, including braggadocio that made people uneasy and might have interfered with his attempts to get a job and make friends.

But Naruns said he never saw Baumhammers enraged.

"The sad thing is that if he could have gotten some counseling or some help, he could have dealt with some of these minor issues before they turned into all of this," Naruns said.

Naruns said he started keeping a polite distance from Baumhammers 2 1/2 years ago after he heard from other friends that Baumhammers had been critical of him.

In one of the more recent conversations between the two, he said Baumhammers said he had applied for a job with an accounting firm in Latvia.

Baumhammers was trained in immigration law, but he hadn't practiced in recent years.

Rec Report

<http://www.recservices.ksu.edu>

Recreational Services' Office Located in Peters Recreation Complex

summer facility use

Staying in Manhattan for the summer? Worried about where you are going to workout? Relax, the Rec Complex and Natatorium are open to K-State students with a valid student ID and who are enrolled in the summer class sessions. If you will be in Manhattan, but are not attending K-State, a summer Rec pass will be available after May 25 to all spring semester students. The cost is $10 per month.

In addition to the workout facilities, the Rec also offers several different aerobics sessions and intramurals during the summer.

"It's a shortened intramural program because not that many students or eligible people are around and the interest level is smaller," Steve Martini, Associate Director of Intramurals/Outdoor Facilities, said. The Rec offers co-rec softball, sand volleyball, men's and women's basketball and several individual sports. Entries will be accepted from June 5-9 and play begins June 15.

Summer time is a great time to be at the Rec.

My Favorite Workout

Lyneda Hamilton never thought a book could change her life. But after reading Body for Life by Bill Phillips, her lifestyle has changed. "Ever since I started reading that book in January, I have been coming to the Rec almost every day," the Olathe native said. Before reading Body for Life, Hamilton only frequented the Rec off and on. According to Hamilton, it was hard to keep motivated at first. But, soon the results started showing.

"I weigh the same as when I started, but my percentage body fat has dropped," she said. "And, the way I feel now keeps me motivated to work out. I have lots of energy."

A typical workout for Hamilton begins early in the morning. On Mondays, Wednesdays and Fridays she lifts free weights, alternating days with upper body and lower body workouts. On Tuesdays, Thursdays, and Saturdays, she does 20 minutes of aerobic exercise. The result of all that hard work and dedication, a healthy and happy Hamilton.

ORC

The Outdoor Rental Center is open! Hours of operation are Sunday through Friday 4 - 6 PM and Saturday 11 AM - 1 PM. We carry a complete line of camping equipment including canoes, tents, sleeping bags, stoves, lanterns, backpacks and ice chests. If you are planning a camping trip, please check with us for your equipment needs. Reservations may be made two weeks in advance. Make your plans now for a great spring camping trip!

June/Summer Intramural Mania

For those of you taking summer session classes or working at the university this summer, we have a slate of intramural activities ready for you. Information sheets for these activities will be available May 22. What better way to enjoy a summer evening than by playing intramural sports!

Pool Action

Colbert Hills Golf Day

Tee times were issued on first-come, first-served basis to Faculty/Staff and students who will be golfing the new course throughout the day of May 4th. Golfers are reminded to arrive 15 minutes early for check-in. The special price of $37.50 includes cart rental. Two more F/S & Student golf opportunities will be offered next fall.

Summer is just around the corner and the Natatorium is the cool place to be. Check out our calendar and web page for summer recreation hours and water exercise sessions.

Special Activity at Colbert Hills

All Faculty/Staff and students are invited to attend a reception and walking tour at the new Colbert Hills Golf Course, May 4th, from 5-7:30 PM. Due to limited parking, please park in the west parking lot at KSU Stadium. Shuttle buses will run from 4:30-7:30 PM.

Locker Rental

Spring locker rentals expire Wednesday, May 31st. If you wish to renew for the summer, please do so in the business office. If you have questions, please call 532-6980.

Working It Out

Get ready for summer and swimsuit weather! Join us in the multipurpose room for exercise sessions. The last day of exercise sessions for spring semester will be Friday, May 5th. Please check the bulletin board outside the multipurpose room for the special exercise session schedule during finals week. Summer exercise sessions will begin Tuesday, June 6th. Summer schedules will be available May 24th.

A winning year!

Thanks for making this a winning year by participating in Rec Services' programs!

Nutrition Notes

Leave edible skins on fruits and vegetables. More vitamins and minerals are found in the outer leaves, skin, and area just below the skin. Also, if you are cooking vegetables, cut them into larger pieces. By doing this, fewer surfaces are exposed and fewer vitamins are lost.

Free Blood Pressure Checks

Blood pressure checks can be requested in the Wellness Resource Center any time a Rec Services fitness consultant is available.

Fitness Facts

Hold your stretch. It takes time to safely lengthen muscle tissue. Hold your stretch at least 30 seconds, possibly longer with very tight muscles. Remember not to bounce. A long, controlled stretch is best if you are by yourself. If you have a workout partner, you may want to consider partner stretching/PNF stretching for great results.

Wellness Resource Center

Fitness consultants offer many helpful services at the Wellness Resource Center in the Recreation Complex. These services include body fat testing, submax VO2 testing, strength & flexibility testing, nutritional assessments, goal setting and workout planning. Fitness consultants are available by appointment to assist you in developing a personalized exercise program. Let the Wellness Resource Center be your key to safe, enjoyable and effective exercise.

Wooldridge speaks at introductory forum

By DEREK BOSS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State head basketball coach Jim Wooldridge took yet another step Monday in casting out the shadows of K-State's 1999-2000 season.

The men's coach spoke to spectators in a forum titled "Meet the Coach," from noon to 1 p.m. in the Union Courtyard.

"I love doing this — talking to people about my job," he said. "It gives me a chance to promote K-State basketball and our future. Whether I'm talking to five or 100 people — I enjoy doing that."

Wooldridge said the objective was to talk to students and faculty, giving them the opportunity to pose questions about the 2000-01 basketball season.

"People let me talk about what I think, too, so it was a lot of give and take," Wooldridge said. "What do you want out of K-State basketball?"

That question was one of a variety of inquiries for the new coach, which included topics concerning how Wooldridge would begin the turnaround, issues about senior Galen Morrison's status on the squad and how Wooldridge is planning to get students in the stands next season.

Regardless of the questions asked, however, the coach said he felt the exclusive question-and-answer session, which was sponsored by Union Program Council Special Events Committee, was productive in getting the message out.

"I think it went real well," Wooldridge said. "We want to promote teamwork, and we can advance things if we all make a turn in the same direction."

So far, Wooldridge said he foresees that turn to be quite attainable, considering the warm welcome he has received from K-State.

"What I said, and I'll say it again, people here have been very fair and very open to me," Wooldridge said. "My reception has been very positive."

"I was real pleased that people understand when you look at what I've done as a coach. I've done well with some of these

It was a shining day for senior PGA golfer Jim Colbert in Manhattan at the Colbert Hills Golf Course opening, despite Monday's rainy conditions.

"Everything that I believe in how the game ought to be played, you see out here," Colbert said as he described the composition and design of the expansive 7,525-yard course.

Monday's dedication of the course was a chance for Colbert to thank the people who helped him develop the course and make it a reality. He also talked about the origin of his vision.

"Thank you, Bill Snyder — you showed us we could do it. Prints and pictures don't do things. People do things. I never thought K-State could win five games, let alone 11 games," he said referring to the K-State football team.

It was a six-year process that included a variety of tasks, such as finding the necessary financial backing for the program. Among the other supporters was K-State President Jon Wefald.

"For a president of a university this was a huge risk. He was talking to me the other night, and he said 'You could have cost me my job,'" Colbert joked about Wefald to the crowd assembled guests and members of the media.

Wefald used such adjectives as "stunning," "first rate" and "world class" to describe the course.

"This is a great celebration for Kansas State University, for Manhattan and for the golfing world," Wefald said. "There are so many VIPs here

Perhaps PGA Tour commissioner Tim Finchem put it best at Monday's Grand Opening tournament at Colbert Hills Golf Course.

"It was probably a day like this, over 500 years ago in Scotland, when two young men started playing a game they called 'gulf,'" Finchem said.

On a day best suited for watching a basketball game in Bramlage Coliseum or, as many on the course said, "this is duck weather," Colbert Hills Golf Course officially opened for play.

Stars from the sport's world came to Manhattan to join Jim Colbert in the first tournament at the course he conceived of and that bears his name.

Lee Trevino, popular player on both the regular and senior PGA Tours, came to support both Colbert and The First Tee program, which is designed to teach golf to less privileged children. LPGA Golfer Annika Sorenstam attended, equipped with warm gloves.

Hole No. 7 at Colbert Hills Golf Course is the course's signature hole because it is the highest point on the course. From the tee box, one can see 800 yards down the fairway and 40 miles to the horizon, according to course officials.

Man fails attempt to reduce bail

■ Colorado resident arrested for sexual predatory intentions.

By TANNER EHMKE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Daniel William Honzik, who was arrested April 20 in a sting operation for the attempted rape of a 13-year-old girl he met over the Internet, faced the District Court on Monday to schedule his preliminary hearing. The court date has been set for 9 a.m. May 12.

Honzik's attorney attempted to reduce his bail of $50,000 by half so that Honzik could return to home in Colorado with his Air Force master sergeant to settle matters with the Air Force. Honzik is employed by the Air Force in Colorado Springs, Colo. His request for a reduced bail was denied due to the seriousness of the charges and that Honzik has no contacts in the Riley County area. His bail remains at $50,000.

Honzik was charged with attempted rape, attempted aggravated indecent liberties with child and attempted aggravated indecent solicitation of a child. Assuming he has no prior convictions, Honzik faces a maximum of 99 months in prison.

Honzik was lured via the Internet by a Colorado resident posing as a 13-year-old child. He was arrested in Manhattan City Park, intending to meet the child at about 10 p.m. The woman acting as the fictitious girl was working in cooperation with the Riley County Police Department.

Authorities said Honzik's reason for driving from Colorado to Manhattan was for sexual gratification with a child.

Alumni offer send-off party to graduates

By KELLY EVENSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students in the class of 2000 are invited to attend an alumni event offered to graduating seniors.

Mitzi Frieling, assistant director of out-of-state and student programs for the KSU Alumni Association, said the annual Senior Send-Off gives seniors the opportunity to have fun, spend time with friends and learn about what the alumni association is about.

The event will be from 5 to 7 p.m. Friday at CarTown, USA, located in the grassy area west of Bramlage Coliseum.

"This is a fun way that we can recognize their achievements at the university," Frieling said. "It is also an informational way to come out and expose them to the alumni association."

Frieling said graduating seniors already should have been mailed a postcard invitation that they must present at the door for free admittance. She said students must RSVP today, and guests will be admitted for $5 each. Children under four also will be admitted at no charge.

Frieling said the event will offer free food and beer as well as grab bags for seniors, door prizes and drawings for K-State apparel and merchandise, gift certificates and other items. Because alcohol will be present, she said, identification will be checked upon entry.

John White, director of membership and marketing for the Alumni Association, said the Tornadoes, storms in Texas leave damage, no injuries

A tornado that destroyed several homes and the local cotton gin was one of at least four twisters that struck northwestern Texas as severe thunderstorms battered the southern Plains.

No serious injuries were reported in the Sunday storms.

Thunderstorms also pounded southwestern and central Oklahoma, dumping heavy rain that pushed rivers above flood stage Monday.

Authorities in Elbert "got plenty of warning, got everybody notified. We got word to them and got them into cellars," said Ron Sadler, dispatcher for the Throckmorton County Sheriff's Department.

Three twisters also were confirmed by the National Weather Service in neighboring Young County, with one described as a half-mile-wide funnel cloud near Olney. Damage was minor, but fallen power lines blocked roads, said Young County sheriff's Deputy Gary Barnett.

In addition to destroying the Elbert Gin, essential to cotton growers in the area, the twister tore down power lines to the town of 150 people.

Barns in the town about 50 miles southwest of Wichita Falls also were destroyed, and hail as big as tennis balls pounded some areas.

Oklahoma rainfall totals included 4.65 inches at Union City, 4.1 in south Oklahoma City and 3.75 at Chandler.

The North Canadian River crested more than 3 feet above flood stage early today in northeast Oklahoma City, but only low-lying farmland was affected. The river was expected to fall below flood stage during the afternoon.

Flooding of agricultural areas and rural roads was expected in parts of central Oklahoma as the river was expected to crest today at Harrah at 16 feet, 2 feet above flood stage.

Winds up to 74 mph blew away part of the roof at Parkview Hospital in El Reno, Okla. No patients were affected by rain that poured through the hole in the roof, officials said.

Lightning started several home fires in Oklahoma City and three juveniles had to be rescued from a swollen creek in the city, Fire Department Maj. Brian Stanaland said. The youths had been playing in the creek when they were caught by rising water.

"The kids were a little cold. They're pretty lucky to be safe," Stanaland said.

Racially motivated attack in England hospitalizes 1

BIRMINGHAM, England — A black man was verbally abused and then set on fire Monday, an attack police said was racially motivated.

The 24-year-old man, whose name was not released pending notification of relatives, was listed in stable condition at Selly Oak Hospital with burns to his face and right arm. His injuries were not thought to be life-threatening.

"There appears to be no motive for the attack apart from the fact it was racially motivated," said Detective Chief Inspector Neil James of the West Midlands Police. "It was a particularly vicious attack aggravated by the fact that the victim was abused verbally prior to being set alight."

Three white men were being sought for questioning, including one described as a skinhead.

Authorities said the victim was walking his girlfriend home in the early hours when he was attacked.

Forensic tests were being carried out to identify the liquid that was sprayed in the man's face before he was set afire. The street where the attack occurred was sealed off so detectives could search it.

Police had not yet questioned the victim, who remained sedated.

Birmingham, which has a working-class image due to its history as a base for trade and manufacturing, is England's second-largest city, located about 105 miles northwest of London.

Pan Am Flight 103 bombing goes to trial after 11 years

CAMP ZEIST, Netherlands — More than 11 years after the bombing of Pan Am Flight 103, victims' families were heading toward a former U.S. Air Force base Monday to witness the trial of two Libyan suspects.

Scottish court authorities said they were trying to keep the trial as routine as possible.

King holiday. Gov. Jim Hodges signed a bill Monday that officially institutes a Martin Luther King Jr. holiday for state workers in South Carolina, but the NAACP criticized the measure because it also creates a Confederate Memorial Day.

South Carolina became the last state in the nation to fully recognize the King holiday as a day off for all state workers. Before Monday, state employees could choose to take the day off, or one of three Confederate-related holidays.

Until recently, some states had the holiday but did not name it for King, preferring to call it Civil Rights Day, for example.

Hodges said the compromise that also made the Confederate holiday, May 10, a day off for all state workers, was necessary for the bill to pass the Legislature, which is embroiled in debate about whether to remove the Confederate flag from the Statehouse dome.

"In my judgment, passing a King holiday is a very important step for South Carolina, and that if I did not sign it, chances are that we might not get one next year," Hodges said. "In fact, we might not get one five years from now."

The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People is urging people to boycott South Carolina until the Confederate flag comes down from the Statehouse. James Gallman, president of the NAACP's state chapter, asked Hodges to veto the King holiday bill.

"Frankly, if I remember my history, we celebrate Memorial Day on the last Monday in May," Gallman said. "I don't see why there should be another Memorial Day."

State Sen. Robert Ford, a black Democrat who sponsored the bill, said King wanted the races to come together and would have supported both holidays.

The new law eliminates South Carolina's Election Day holiday and the floating holiday for state offices.

The Legislature approved the bill last month after a bitter fight in the Republican-controlled House. The bill failed on its first try and was approved only after lawmakers attached amendments that protected Confederate monuments and proclaimed the Confederate flag is not a racist symbol.

As early as next week, the House could begin debate on a bill that would remove the flag and fly a similar banner at a monument on Statehouse grounds that honors Confederate soldiers. The bill has passed the Senate.

With that debate looming, state Rep. John Scott, a Democrat, said he supported Hodges' signing the King bill.

Lawmaker won't seek re-election

By JOHN HANNA
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — House Speaker Robin Jennison won't return to the Legislature next year so he can run a fledgling company that plans to promote hunting as a way to draw tourists to Kansas.

Jennison said Monday he has been working on his business venture since October and has four associates, whom he declined to name. The new company is Kansas Outdoors, and Jennison described it as a public-relations firm.

He plans to finish his term as speaker, which ends in January, but he won't seek re-election to the House. The Republican from Healy has been a state representative for 10 years.

Both chambers will have new leaders when the Legislature convenes in January. Senate President Dick Bond, R-Overland Park, also is retiring.

Jennison said his new company will concentrate on promoting hunting in 52 rural Kansas counties, most of them in western Kansas. He said he will work from his hometown and that the firm eventually will open an office in Topeka.

He said he was more excited about starting the new company than he was when he first took his seat in the House in 1991. He said he hopes to create a hunting industry in Kansas to draw tourists.

"I think that hunting can do for Kansas things similar to what the skiing industry has done for Colorado," he said. "I have a fairly vivid imagination. My staff can tell you that."

Jennison also said financial considerations played a role in his decision.

"I have come to a position where I need to either return home, or I need to be making adequate income to hire someone to take my place," he said. "Quite frankly, I cannot do that in the Legislature."

Jennison, a 46-year-old farmer and rancher who once rode bulls in collegiate and small-town rodeos, was first elected to the House in 1990.

The performance preceded a speech by Richard Long at the 13th annual American ethnic studies banquet.

Banquet rewards American ethnic studies

Border crossing is one of the main metaphors of scholarship today, said Richard Long, the Atticus Haygood professor of interdisciplinary studies at Emory University's Graduate Institute of Liberal Arts.

He challenged students and faculty of American ethnic studies to think broadly about the metaphorical meaning behind the term and apply it to their own lives and professions.

Long was the featured guest speaker at the 13th annual American ethnic studies banquet Monday evening in the Union Main Ballroom.

"The Spirit of Culture: Music, Dance and Language" was the theme for the banquet.

Wanda Ebright, assistant professor of dance and a member of the adjunct faculty for American ethnic studies, said the term "border crossing" has particular meaning for her.

"For me, the topic takes me other places and has me thinking about how my program relates to the rest of the university," Ebright said.

For example, she said border crossing comes into play when she recruits dancers to K-State. She said she tries to change the perception that some out-of-state people have about Kansas and what the state has to offer them.

The crowd of about 70 attendees listened to musicians during the candle-lit dinner.

Along with the presentations of student leadership scholarships and awards, the event also featured an artistic performance titled "The Spirit of Birth." It featured a narrator and an interpretive dancer to the accompaniment of jazz.

Dennis Wilson, assistant dean of arts and sciences and the creator of the piece, said the narrations in the performance came from selections of literature from many of Long's books.

Wilson said none of the artists were allowed to rehearse the piece beforehand.

"Whatever you had expected to hear, it won't be like that," Wilson said. "But hopefully it will be just as good."

Shanna Burruss, junior in English literature and creative writing and the winner of the Wayne Rohrer Scholarship, said the jazz music set the mood for the night.

"I enjoyed how the evening flowed together," Burruss said.

Long will present "Katherine Dunham: Paths of a Pioneer" at 9:30 a.m. today in Union Forum Hall as part of the American ethnic studies lecture series.

New golf course should not forget K-State

One of the most over-anticipated events in years occurred Monday.

Colbert Hills Golf Course officially opened in fitting fashion after six years of construction with an invitation-only dedication ceremony.

The invitation-only event describes what Colbert Hills will be — a place for the elite members of the Manhattan community and wealthy golfers statewide to tee off. It is not a course for local college students who want to try what has been rated the toughest course in Kansas.

The course, however, seems to want to cater to this group. It offers students, faculty and staff a discounted green fee of about $45 Monday through Thursday and $60 on weekends. Or they get a bargain of only $35 Monday through Thursday and $45 on weekends if they are willing to be placed on standby.

But these token discounts hardly make the course affordable for the K-State community. Most college students are struggling for money.

Faculty and staff are notoriously underpaid.

Yet the course's general manager, David Gourlay, said the fees would be even higher — probably twice as much — if the course were anywhere else in Kansas.

While prices might be higher in another locale, course officials are failing to recognize the importance of K-State in the course's development.

K-State is much of the reason — OK, the entire reason — Manhattan is a community worthy of a PGA-caliber golf course.

For this, K-State's reward is ... a minimal discount.

Organizers should reexamine how they are treating the university that has given them their jobs.

Without some support from students, faculty and staff, the course will become a well-groomed cattle field.

It is time to work for that support.

Guest column featured many misleading errors

Editor,

In her column Monday regarding the Elian Gonzales raid, Danele Thompson argues that the federal government violated three constitutional amendments. Regardless of what people think about the raid, it is important to note some glaring errors in Thompson's legal analysis.

The Fourth Amendment, which safeguards against unreasonable searches and seizures, generally is satisfied when the government obtains a valid search warrant from a court prior to conducting a raid. It appears the Justice Department obtained such a warrant in this matter, which suggests the Fourth Amendment was not violated. Thompson claims the Sixth Amendment guarantees due process, when in fact that Amendment guarantees a speedy jury trial. It is the Fifth Amendment that guarantees due process at the federal level.

Thompson doesn't specifically mention the other amendment the government allegedly violated. Based on her discussion of gun rights, one only can assume she was referring to the Second Amendment.

However, it is difficult to understand how a raid like the one carried out in this case violates the right to bear arms. The government did not seize any guns or otherwise prevent anyone from owning guns, so there does not appear to have been any violation of the Second Amendment.

It is important for people to vigilantly guard against abuses by the government. But in doing so, it is equally as important to apply the correct legal analysis.

In this case, Thompson's good intentions are somewhat overshadowed by her shoddy research.

'Gilligan's Island' characters too restrictive of mold for today's women

Oh, for life to be as it is on "Gilligan's Island."

One can frolic on the beach wearing glamorous ballgowns and eating coconuts. One gets to live in grass huts and seduce aging millionaires. One gets to watch a brilliant professor practice his "MacGyver"-like moves on nature and witness ridiculousness coming from a dorky guy wearing a red shirt. One gets to live an imaginary life. But here on Earth, America in particular, there is no such life. So I was surprised to see several "Gilligan's Island"-related polls given to college students across the nation to rank the characters of the once-popular TV show.

Females need to listen because I think some valuable information came from the isle of idiocy.

According to the poll, men are no longer looking for the essence of Ginger in a woman. Almost 80 percent of men polled said their dream woman was a pig-tailed, gingham-wearing Mary Ann.

What a relief, right? Does this mean women who sell their bodies for sex and take their clothes off for money are out of the game? Nobody needs to worry about their boyfriends or husbands having affairs on the side or leaving them? Men no longer want to marry a femme fatale?

This newfound fact is a lot like "Gilligan's Island" — imaginary.

It is time for women not to be put in these categories that leaves them with no room to stretch their minds or wardrobes.

How can women be defined as Mary Ann or Ginger? How can we fit into these narrow categories? I see more individualized women on campus each day. Yes, there are those who are followers, but they are trying to figure out where they stand within the circle of the largest gender on the planet.

I realize this was only one stupid little poll somebody had to do for a job somewhere, but when you really think about it, this is just an example of narrow-minded Americans thinking up dumb poll ideas.

I also am sure this poll was wrong because I think seductive women still are finding husbands and leading happy lives. I believe men still are going to be tempted by beautiful girls because women are beautiful and some are extra beautiful, and resistance is a problem.

So whether you are a Mary Ann or a Ginger is really not important.

Women are individuals and capable of creating identities without stereotyping. Falling into a category should not be the goal for any woman.

Even if a woman is considered a Ginger or a Mary Ann, she should know she does not need to agree with this hedonistic view.

So whether you are a Gap girl, vintage lover, careless dresser, college student by day/stripper by night, frequent credit-card user, mother, margarita guzzler, band groupie or gingham-wearer, you must remember you are you.

You must remember to strive to find yourself amid this urgency-for-cloning world. It is an effort well worth the time. Do not fear being different or strange because being original is essential in avoiding the trap of becoming a Social Security number. Women are too diverse to settle into a two-category world.

So, as I close my last column of the semester I, too, will attempt to figure out where it is I fit in this Wal-Mart loving world. Although I prefer Target any day of the week, I know sometimes Wal-Mart is handy.

Trudging into foreign or annoying situations is not fun but is part of life. So is figuring out how to get out of that foreign or annoying situation.

Take it with the grace of a woman with an open mind.

Take it with the knowledge that it might enlighten you as a person of either gender.

Those of you who I force to read the opinion page each week can rest easy because this is the last time.

My friend and I were talking the other day about my columns and he said, "I'm having trouble remembering one of your columns that wasn't about religion or greets." This got me thinking about what topics I've covered this semester, and since a lot of people think I've written on a short list of subjects, I've decided to recap a semester's worth of ignorance and religious bigotry by yours truly.

While I completely disagree with his statements, I said he should go unpunished because the interview happened during the off-season in his home. Strength in Christ

I was having a horrible week, and I was frustrated because I had no idea what my column was going to be about. I just started writing about what was going through my head, which resulted in one of my best and most personal columns. Jesus is the only one I can depend on and is my source of strength. A lot of people think it was dumb for me to write about Jesus, but in a crappy world of fakeness and letdowns, he is the only one who gets us through it all. If you don't have him in your life, you're missing out.

Fred Phelps

This column was about how Phelps doesn't represent Christianity. People turned it into a gay-bashing editorial full of hateful intolerance. I condemn Phelps's doctrine and his tactics but not the fact that he says homosexuality is wrong. Jesus would have shown compassion for homosexuals, but at the same time command them to flee their sinful lifestyle and follow him.

Greeks

Everyone seems to have an opinion about how to fix the problems within the greek system. Yes, it has some serious issues to fix, but the solutions to those problems don't need to come from people who haven't been there to experience them first hand.

Christian martyrs

Christians can learn a lot about real from the way people like Rachel Scott and the millions who have gone before her suffered and died for Christ. If you can't stand up for Jesus now, when being a Christian is easy, then how will you do it when times get tough?

Women's basketball team signs 2 recruits

Former K-State player Ramage makes 1st 18 cut for LA Sparks

By MICHAEL NOLL
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Former K-State women's basketball player Nicky Ramage's basketball career might just be getting started.

Ramage, the Cats' most valuable player last season, has made the initial cut to 18 players for the Los Angeles Sparks and will leave as early as today to join the Sparks' camp.

Now she must make some quick adjustments to balance classes and basketball.

"It's just finally starting to hit me now," Ramage said. "I've got so many things to do in just one day."

Despite her long list of honors at K-State, Ramage said her name on the roster came as a surprise.

"You never really know," Ramage said. "There were 40 girls there, and the coaches there don't really favor anybody. It's not until the end, when they tell you, that you know."

Ramage, who played forward/center at K-State, could wind up playing in the paint or on the perimeter. Either way, Ramage is just going to play hard in the hopes of making the final cut to 11 players next month, she said.

"I'm just going to go in like I did at the tryout," Ramage said. "I definitely want to make the team."

By MICHAEL NOLL
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State women's basketball team addressed both pressing concerns and the future with the signings of two players on Monday.

Expected to contribute immediately is 5-foot, 4-inch point guard Sholanda Booker, a sophomore at Coffeyville Community College.

Last season, the Detroit native averaged eight points per game and was among the conference leaders in steals. The latter statistic is one of the most exciting, especially after the Cats struggled last year to find quickness on the perimeter. K-State head coach Deb Patterson said.

"Sholanda will be far and away the quickest guard that we've ever had in our program," Patterson said. "She has great explosiveness and is a very pesky defender."

"The first manner in which she will contribute is defensively. She has lightning-quick hands. Something we haven't had is a perimeter player on the floor who could get us easy baskets from steals."

Booker's quickness will add variety to the guard position. Last season, K-State often depended on the three-point shot when its guards could not penetrate. The addition of Booker will strengthen the point guard position, Patterson said.

"We are continuing to solidify our options at the point guard position," Patterson said. "Sholanda's greatest strength lies in her ability to push the basketball up the floor. She has not concentrated on scoring from the perimeter, but she has the ability to break the defense down."

Booker partially derives her quickness from her small size, which could present problems next year, Patterson said.

"The biggest challenge will be handling the physical nature of Division I," Patterson said. "She's slight of build, a very wiry character."

Size notwithstanding, Booker is expected to contribute immediately, Patterson said.

"She will see game time relatively early on in her career," Patterson said. "I would anticipate us integrating her into the point guard position as she proves she's able."

The second addition to the team is guard Kimmery Newsome, a senior at Pearl Cohn High School in Nashville, Tenn. Unlike Booker, Newsome might fall more into the "project" category.

The way in which Newsome handles the transition from high school to college basketball will determine how much playing time she will see. Making that transition difficult is the fact that Newsome has not seen a great deal of national competition, Patterson said.

"She hasn't had a lot of national caliber competition, AAU experience," Patterson said. "We'll see when she evolves into someone who can contribute. She can shoot the three well, but she needs to improve her ball handling."

"Kimmery has a four-year time window to develop her skills further."

Success continues for track, field team

By MICHAEL NOLL
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Drake Relays over the weekend had a familiar pattern for the K-State track and field team.

K-State's athletes, who have performed well all season, continued the winning tradition at the prestigious Drake Relays in Des Moines, Iowa, this weekend.

"Overall, this was a pretty good meet," head coach Cliff Rovelto said. "Certainly anytime you can come away from a meet like this with a couple of wins, it is pretty good."

In the pole vault, Erin Anderson had a height of 12 feet 11 inches to win the collegiate portion of the event. In the 5,000 meters, Amy Mortimer continued storming the national scene in the middle-distance events with a winning time of 16:15.

This time around, the competition used almost every strategy possible to defeat the freshman, but Mortimer still prevailed. At the beginning of the race, Mortimer was boxed in and knocked down and the race had to be recalled and restarted.

Despite suffering a bruised knee and shoulder, she still was able to separate herself from the field and win the race.

The third first-place medal went to the sprint medley relay team of Bromeke Holmes, Carmen Wright, Nicole Grose and Korene Hinds. Hinds then went on to finish second in the 1,500 meters with a time of 4:24.

K-State also experienced success in the women's distance medley relay, as the team of Hinds, Grose, Amanda Crouse and Mortimer finished second, and the women's shuttle relay team also placed third.

For the men, the sprint medley relay team of Jason Green, Sean Redmond, Roberto Carvajal and Matt Davis finished third in its heat and 13th overall with a time of 3:25.13. In the 800 meters, Istvan Nagy finished ninth with a time of 1:53.49.

The majority of K-State's throwers traveled to Kansas City, Mo., for the University of Missouri at Kansas City Invitational. Results for this meet were unavailable at press time.

The Cats will be in action next this weekend. Most of the team will travel to Lincoln, Neb., for a triangular, and K-State will be host to its only meet of the year, a heptathlon/decaathlon, Friday and Saturday.

Wildcats prepare to play unranked Wichita State

By MIKE VIETTI
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

After dropping two of three games to Missouri over the weekend, K-State returns home today to face Wichita State at 2 p.m. at Frank Myers Field.

The Wildcats (17-26 overall, 4-19 Big 12) enter the two-game series with the Shockers having lost five of their past six Big 12 Conference games to Iowa State and the Tigers.

After being ranked in the top 15 in the preseason and in the top 25 for most of the year, Wichita State (31-15, 18-6 Missouri Valley) comes to Manhattan unranked, with a 4-5 record in its past nine games.

Although the Cats lost the series to Missouri, K-State improved offensively from the past three games against the Cyclones and the single contest against Creighton. In those games, the Wildcats scored a total of eight runs.

In contrast, the Cats were able to score 17 runs against Missouri, highlighted by Sunday's 9-6 win, which snapped a six-game losing skid that came on the heels of K-State's seven-game winning streak against non-conference foes and Oklahoma State.

K-State's team batting average is improving and has finally crept above .300 to .304, while the Wildcats' team ERA has risen in the past two weeks to 7.04.

The Shockers stand in first place in the Missouri Valley Conference, paced by solid hitting with a .318 team batting average as well as a pitching staff that has a team ERA of 4.68.

Wichita State has eight regular or semi-regular players hitting above .300, with five of those having averages higher than .348. Koyie Hill leads the team in hitting at .390 and is second with 45 RBIs.

Pat Magness leads the team with 12 home runs, 58 RBI and 119 total bases, while also hitting .352.

The Wildcats will travel to Wichita on Wednesday to face the Shockers, with the first pitch scheduled for 7 p.m. at Eck Stadium.

Spring game showing one of several reasons why Roberson should start over Beasley in season's 1st game

As a friend of PETA, the People for the Ethical Treatment of Animals, I've never been an advocate of beating a horse, especially a dead one. But when it comes to K-State's quarterback quandary, you can pass the stick. I'll swing all day if I have to.

I've got three good reasons why Jonathon Beasley should not be the starting signal caller when the Eddie Robinson Classic rolls around this August.

They are I, I and I. As in "I.I.I." You know, Eli Roberson III. I drove the Roberson bandwagon last year and will ride that train again.

I won't bother to mention the shining performance that Roberson put on during the spring scrimmage.

I'm not going to take the time to talk about the way he made some fine Wildcat defenders look like they were standing still as he galloped into the endzone. Three times. I'm not going to bring all of that up because no matter how you cut it, one measly spring game doesn't mean a whole lot.

To its credit, the K-State defense was limited in its available plays. No ma'am, the spring game shouldn't be heralded as the "second coming" of Michael Bishop.

Nope. The "second coming" of Bishop should be August in the Eddie Robinson Classic. I've heard all of the arguments against starting Roberson, and they don't seem to stack up.

The complaint about not having "game experience" is ridiculous. What quarterback can get his first start and have game experience at the same time?

It can't be done.

Roberson has to start somewhere, and I can't think of a better starting place than against the hapless Iowa Hawkeyes in August. I know it's a faux pas to insult the opposition, but the game against Iowa should be over in the first quarter. The only thing that will keep the Wildcat faithful from suffering from "blowout boredom" is that they finally can buy a beer at a regular season game.

"The first quarter's over. Pass the Schlitz."

Look at it this way: The Hawkeyes had a dismal 1-10 record last year. They actually recorded one fewer "W" than Temple.

There have been seasons when the Hawkeyes had to play a scrimmage just to put a win in the books. They are the type of team that allows you to try out new plays. The Hawkeyes are the type of team that affords you the opportunity to punt on first down, or play the entire game in gunnysacks. I don't care if Roberson breaks both of his arms during the summer and donates his liver for research, behind the strength of the K-State offensive line, Roberson would be able to defeat Iowa.

Against Iowa, Roberson should get his first start. Unless head coach Bill Snyder has something wild up his sleeve, the play calling against such a mediocre team will be simplistic at best. Let Roberson use the game not only to get his feet wet but also to get a dose of confidence.

The other argument in favor of putting Roberson on the bench is both Beasley and Bishop had spotty junior campaigns, so we should expect big things out of Beasley this year.

Let me get this straight.

This is what we know: Bishop was a tad rough around the edges in his first season, and Beasley was suspect at times last year, his debut season as the Wildcat starter. This leads to one conclusion — any quarterback stepping into the rigors of K-State football is going to struggle getting adjusted to the Snyder system.

If we are expecting a tough start for Roberson, let's get his shaky season out of the way now, and prepare him for the next three years. If we think Roberson is going to struggle, let him struggle now. If he flounders, put Beasley in. What will be done if Roberson is kept out until next year and he struggles then? We won't have an experienced quarterback standing in the background to bail him out.

This year would be a perfect opportunity to let Roberson work the kinks out. With the

1. Jecminkova's move has been highlighted by several wins, Bietau said.

"Alena has played some outstanding tennis in the month of April," Bietau said. "She's had wins at No. 1 against Texas A&M, Nebraska and Missouri. Then she lost 6-4 in the third set to Texas two weeks ago."

The biggest difference between the two matches against Oklahoma State was attitude, Bietau said.

"Probably most importantly, the players felt like they had something to prove in this match," Bietau said. "They were disappointed with the results of our match here. I think they were stunned early in the match and didn't recover well enough to come back."

Now that K-State has claimed a top-four finish in the Big 12 Tournament, the players and coach are now just waiting for the NCAA Tournament selection committee to announce the bracket on Thursday.

"It's in their hands now," Bietau said. "Anytime you have a win in a season over somebody as high as Baylor, there's no way to get overlooked. At the same time, they look at the entire record, what's your next biggest win and biggest losses. We'll just have to wait and see."

receiving crew K-State will field next year, Roberson will have the necessary weapons.

The newly anointed "Air Club for Men" is amazing. They're the types of receivers that make opposing defensive backs cry themselves to sleep at night.

Quincy Morgan could make Jeff George look good, and that's a feat if I've ever seen one. I mean no disrespect for Beasley; we owe him credit for 11 wins last year, and for his success I am grateful.

I don't pretend to know more than Snyder does. When it comes to Yahtzee or creative ramen noodle recipes, I might have the edge on Snyder, but in the world of football, he's the pro. Whatever decision he makes likely will be correct. But for now, I'm on the Roberson bandwagon, and if you ask real nice, I'll save you a seat.

After all, good things come in threes.

Health QUESTION

By: Jay Reppert

MD and medical director of Lafene Health Center

Q: How can you prevent/treat spring colds?

A: A spring cold can be either a viral infection or an allergy. Both can present a runny nose, watery eyes, cough and sore throat. Many times, patients with allergies will have some itching of the eyes, nose or throat. Persons with viral infections usually do not have itching.
